I find, Mr. Chairman, that I have occupied longer time than I expected.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few words?

Mr. BUCKNER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I dislike very much to say anything in opposition to a bill which comes before the Committee of the Whole House with the sanction of a standing committee of the House. This is a measure, however, of a great deal of importance. If we make a mistake in confirming these land titles upon the report of this committee, it does not necessarily conclude the parties who may be claimants to some portions of some of these lands; but the whole subject is left open to litigation in the courts. In other words, the issuing of a patent does not necessarily settle the title to the lands. A patent does pass the legal title, but the equities which lie behind the patent may still be overhauled by the courts, and the parties who are really entitled to the lands may litigate their rights notwithstanding the issue of the patent. It is exceedingly important, therefore, before a patent shall issue in any case that it shall be almost absolutely certain that it is issued to the rightful party. Now, no man need tell me that in the case of grants which bear the age of these it is possible to ascertain with absolute certainty that the parties in whose favor the report is made are the right parties.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there are two objections to this bill. In the first place it rests upon the report only of the surveyor-general. Now, if this surveyor-general is immaculate in his honesty—and I have no reason to doubt it at all and do not question it—it is morally certain that he does not possess all the legal learning and wisdom of the country, and is undoubtedly liable to make mistakes. I do not believe that a bill involving so many titles as this should be passed by this House upon the report of any one single man. The practice heretofore has been in the case of land grants similar to those claimed under the Louisiana purchase and the Florida purchase to settle the titles either by a court or by what is equivalent to it, a commission.

Mr. BUCKNER. In Louisiana the largest number of these claims were considered by a single officer.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, that was a bad practice. The much better practice is to confirm them on the report of a commission selected for their learning and law and for their capacity to ascertain facts. I do not believe that we ought to confirm these titles on the report of one man. That is the first objection I have to the bill.

Then, sir, it seems to me there is a second objection, which is that this is a confirmation, that my friend has said, not of specific grants determined by metes and bounds, but of grants by number, the extent of which when surveyed is not at all indicated by the bill now before us or by the report upon which the bill is based. It does seem to me that, for the interest of all parties concerned and for the protection of the Government, these lands ought to be surveyed before there shall be a confirmation of the grants.

Now I concede that these parties interested ought to have their titles settled. Congress ought to act on the subject, and there should not be any unnecessary delay; but it is better that when we do act we shall act so as to foreclose all possible future litigation that can be avoided and at the same time so act as to leave the question all open to controversey among the claimants of the lands.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word upon this bill. I shall not take up much of the time of the committee, but I wish to call attention to some features of this case which it seems to me deserve consideration. It is assumed that these grants are the property of Mexicans living in New Mexico.

If the fact be true, it is well to remember that these Mexicans are a pastoral people, an ignorant people, who know nothing of land titles, who have no knowledge of the forms of litigation, and who have little means either in intellect or in money of defending themselves in case of litigation. That ought not to be lost sight of when we undertake to adjudicate wholesale upon the titles to the land upon which they themselves live, our adjudication extending to millions of acres, and especially in view of the fact that the very record before us discloses the fact that many of these grants are in controversy between different parties.

Why, sir, the very first case in the bill is awarded to those who went out of possession of the land nearly a hundred years ago and against those who have been long in possession of that land, and it will be observed by reference to the testimony that some witnesses showed themselves to have been over one hundred years old.

Mr. ELKINS. There is nothing of that kind in the testimony.

Mr. REAGAN. I will show you by the record here in the very first case; Ramon Baca says upon page 21, "I was born in 1763." He was testifying in 1870.

Mr. ELKINS. That is a misprint.

Mr. REAGAN. But there is another case in which a man makes himself out older than that. I do not make any special point upon that, but here, Mr. Speaker, is what it seems to me deserves attention. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] says that the committee reported these fifty-seven cases on the examination of the surveyor-general. They are not here, let the House understand, by numbers only, but each one is here on the record containing the petition and showing the absence of litigation. In answer to a question put to me by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] I will say that I know of no formal protests except the protest which comes from the contestant parties over these lands. There is a protest to that extent on record in many cases. I have not had time or opportunity, and I regret it very much, to give that attention to this bill which it deserves; but I wish to say that in the discussion which sprung up when the bill was first before the committee, and in which I took part, I assumed that under the eighth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo the rights of the Mexicans were guaranteed as firmly and as absolutely as the rights of any American citizens could be. They are absolutely guaranteed; they are good in any court, good in any action at law or in equity in any court where such an action is permitted by the laws of this country, without any action by the surveyor-general or by Congress.

I assume, therefore, that if these titles were themselves good and perfect, no legislation was called for to confirm them. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] answers that by saying that the object of this bill is to cure the defects in inchoate titles. Yet he asserts that the committee have examined these records. The bill itself refers to the confirmation of valid grants alone, no one of which grants is to date later than the 18th of August, 1824.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. You hold that there was no necessity in regard to all these grants for any action at all on the part of the Government; is that your position?

Mr. REAGAN. My position is that the title is good without Government action; as good as the law can make it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then the law of 1854 was nugatory, unnecessary, and nonsensical. That is your position, is it?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not go into that matter; but I say that they are titles that are good.

Mr. HOOKER. As it is evident that we will not reach a conclusion upon this bill this evening, will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] give way to a motion that the committee now rise?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not intend to make a speech, and as perhaps the friends of the bill may desire a vote upon it to-day——

Mr. HOOKER. There will be no quorum here.

Mr. REAGAN. I am informed that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] desires to take the floor upon this bill to-day in order that he may proceed with its discussion when it shall be again taken up. I have but few more words to say, and will go on now. I have referred to this matter for no other purpose than to show that this committee have not examined these titles. The gentleman who reports this bill, a sweeping bill, covering fifty-seven titles and embracing from eleven leagues down to each title—and recollect that a league is 44.60 acres—the gentleman speaks of this bill as one to validate inchoate titles, although the bill itself is one to confirm valid titles, none of which is to date later than August 18, 1824, and must have been titles either by grant or by prescription. The gentleman certainly cannot have examined the records in this case.

Various things have become apparent in the previous discussion as well as in the discussion of to-day to satisfy my mind that this is a dangerous leap, to attempt by an act of Congress to confirm these titles, in which, according to a statement of a member of the committee reporting the bill, there is involved the interest of 34,000 people, when it is clear to my mind that the committee have not examined these titles or the records connected with them, and they are to-day unable to state the facts to this House.

I have not given three hours' attention to this bill and the documents connected with it, but yet that little time has been sufficient to show me that the friends of the bill are unable this evening to state to the House the facts as they are known to me from the little examination I have made.

It is too much to ask this House to take this leap in the dark, and to establish titles to such an enormous extent of land, involving the interests of so many people, without further and more thorough investigation. It seems to me that fewer of these claims ought to have been brought forward at one time. It would have been enough to have brought forward one claim involving, as some of these do, from five thousand acres and upward, so that members might have had an opportunity to look into the facts and ascertain the history of the claims, the legality of the rights, and the equity of the parties concerned in the claims.

Mr. BUCKNER. These claims have been before Congress for four or five years, and it is not true to say that they have not been examined.

Mr. REAGAN. It seems to me that there are too many of these claims brought forward at one time.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman yield to a motion that the committee now rise?

Mr. REAGAN. Not now; I want to say a few words more, and then I will give way so that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] can take the floor upon this bill. The object of this bill is not to obtain a survey of these lands particularly, in order to ascertain the extent of these grants, as the law says was one of the duties devolved upon the surveyor-general by the act of 1854, so that Congress could know how much land it granted away when it confirmed any one of these titles. We are informed by gentlemen who have looked into this matter that the surveyor-general has attempted only in a general way to define the boundaries of these claims.

If gentlemen will look at case 62 involved in this bill, which is one of the two or three cases I have looked at, they will find that by the act of the surveyor-general, to whom I impute no bad motive—there is no suspicion of that, for he has submitted the record—it is proposed to confirm a grant of seven leagues of land, when by the description of the title five and a half leagues is all that could be confirmed. I will not say that I am entirely accurate in that statement, but it is stated that the report is for about two leagues too much, and it is shown on the face of the papers that the recommendation of the surveyor-general covers two leagues too much.

How many more such cases there are I am not able to say. I only say that I am not prepared to leap in the dark, to legislate in this way upon the rights of an ignorant people, without wealth, without knowledge of our language or our forms of judicature. I am not prepared without fuller and more explicit information than I now have to take this leap in the dark in reference to as many litigated claims as there are embraced in this bill, and to say by one sweeping act that we will confirm the titles to one and a half millions of acres of land, even taking the amount as stated by the chairman of the committee, though the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] says that it is 1,000,000 acres more than that amount. I am not prepared to vest titles in this vast amount of land under such circumstances.

My own judgment is that duty to New Mexico and her humble population, as well as to the United States, whose interest it is that the public domain should be protected, requires that this bill be recommitted, and that, if all these titles are brought here together again, they shall come here under circumstances which will enable the committee to tell us whether we are asked to confirm valid titles or inchoate titles, and whether there are controversies between different claimants to the same land.

I have nothing to add, except to tell an anecdote in regard to the country about which my colleague spoke, between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. I will take up the case where he left off. In 1854 a commission, consisting of two gentlemen, went there to investigate and allow Mexican titles. One of them was a humorous gentleman and a very frank man. He returned very soon; and a friend meeting him asked, "How is it you are back so soon? We expected you to be there all the fall." "Well," said he, "we got through with all the land that was between the Nueces and the Rio Grande; and as there was nothing more to do, we thought we would come home." A commission dealing with five thousand acres of land at one stroke can soon get through with a pretty large country; and when the law-making authority comes to confirm the action of such a commission, comes to deal with the titles of a whole people, embracing towns and rural settlements, it owes it to those people and the country to see that it does not do a great wrong by a sweeping universal confirmation of all sorts of claims under all sorts of circumstances.

Mr. JOYCE obtained the floor, and yielded to

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the Private Calendar generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, but had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1800) for the relief of Kendrick and Avis; Kuner, Zisemann & Zott; Kuner & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri; and Nachtrieb & Co., of Galion, Ohio;

An act (H. R. No. 2134) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds;

An act (H. R. No. 2140) establishing Cheboygan, in the State of Michigan, a port of delivery;

An act (H. R. No. 2431) to correct an error in section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to extradition; and

An act (H. R. No. 3573) to award "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands approved December 28, 1874," and for other purposes.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. FOSTER in place of Mr. WALDRON, resigned, as a member of the committee of conference on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

SILVER COIN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair at the request of several members asks that two propositions under consideration in the Committee on Banking and Currency as substitute for the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The proposed substitutes are as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin now in the Treasury to an amount not exceeding $10,000,000, in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes; and the notes so received in exchange shall be kept as a special fund, separate and apart from all other money in the Treasury, and be re-issued only upon the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency received at the Treasury in payment of dues to the United States; and said fractional currency, when so substituted, shall be destroyed and held as part of the sinking fund, as provided in the act approved April 17, 1876.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That in addition to the amount of subsidiary coin authorized by law to be issued in redemption of the fractional currency, it shall be lawful to manufacture at the several mints, and issue through the Treasury and its several offices, such coin to the amount of $20,000,000.

SEC. 2. That the silver bullion required for this purpose shall be purchased from time to time, at market rate, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the resulting coin may be issued in the ordinary disbursement of the Treasury, or in exchange for legal-tender notes at par; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue or exchange as herein provided without loss to the Treasury, and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $1,000,000.

SEC. 3. That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit, from time to time, the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ODELL for five days;

To Mr. MONEY for two weeks, on account of important business;

To Mr. WOODWORTH for fifteen days, on account of important business;

To Mr. POWELL for four days;

To Mr. SLEMONS for twenty days from to-morrow;

To Mr. BURLEIGH for one week;

To Mr. CHITTENDEN for four days;

To Mr. WALDRON for one week;

To Mr. KELLEY for three days;

To Mr. WHITING for five days; and

To Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, for ten days, on account of important business.

REFRESHMENT.

Mr. FOSTER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be requested to furnish this House with such refreshment as has been customary.

PACIFIC RAILROADS BONDS AND SECURITIES.

Mr. WIKE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to ascertain whether or not the railroad corporations mentioned, or any of them, under acts entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad and its extension to Red River," approved July 25, 1866; and "An act granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of a southern branch of the Union Pacific Railway and Telegraph from Fort Riley, Kansas, to Fort Smith, Arkansas," approved July 26, 1866; and "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast," approved July 27, 1866, have issued any bonds or securities of any kind predicated upon the conditional grants of the lands of the Indians on the Indian Territory claimed by said companies under the said acts. And if it be ascertained that such bonds or securities have been issued, then it shall be the duty of said committee to ascertain the amount of the same, in what hands they are held, and whether or not the public faith of the United States has been pledged for their payment or redemption.

Be it further resolved, That the said committee in the discharge of their duties be authorized to call for persons and papers, and to report the result of their investigation to the House as early as practicable.

Mr. WIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY S. FRENCH.

Mr. MILLIKEN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 473) for the relief of Henry S. French, of Nashville, Tennessee, with amendments; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLIKEN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALLAN EDDY.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask unanimous consent to put on its passage a bill granting a pension to Allan Eddy, a soldier of the war of 1812.

Mr. BELL. I object, and I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask that a letter be read which I think will remove all objection.

Mr. BELL. I insist on the regular order.

SEIZURE OF COTTON.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2368) authorizing payment for cotton seized after May 29, 1865, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider in all the cases just acted on; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I move the House take a recess until eight o'clock this evening for the purpose of going on with the debate on the Geneva award bill.

The motion was disagreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. KEHR, (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CHAPIN: The petition of 29 citizens of Newburyport, Massachusetts, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. GOODE: Papers relating to the petition of Edward L. Young, for compensation for injuries received in the naval service, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HILL: A paper relating to a post-route from Clarksville, Habersham County, to King's Store, Rabun County, Georgia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. MAGOON: Memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, for the establishment of a tri-weekly mail from Marquette, via Kingston, to Portage, Wisconsin, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Henry L. Mann, Samuel Merrick, and 58 other citizens of Fair Play, Grant County, Wisconsin, that the present tariff on lead be retained, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Blue Ridge, North Carolina, via Tryon, to Campobello, South Carolina, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WALSH: The petition of John Fulton, for compensation for cord-wood, grain, and hay taken and used by the United States Army in 1863, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: The petition of John P. Williams, of Gibson County, Tennessee, for compensation for a horse lost in the war with Mexico, to the Committee of Claims.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 10, 1876.

Prayer by Rev. P. H. BURGHENETT, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 2684) to amend sections 246 and 251 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, as amended by the twelfth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; and

A bill (H. R. No. 882) for the relief of Mrs. James K. Polk, of Nashville, Tennessee—to the Committee on Claims.

MEAD'S STATUE OF ETHAN ALLEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the thanks of this Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people, of the State of Vermont for the statue of Ethan Allen, whose name is so honorably identified with our revolutionary history; that this work of art is accepted in the name of the nation, and assigned a place in the old Hall of Representatives, already set aside by Congress for the statues of eminent citizens; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Vermont.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, before coming to the work of Larkin G. Mead, presented by the State of Vermont as a part of her contribution to the Statuary Hall, I hope it will not be disagreeable to the Senate if for a moment I allude to the Hall itself.

The rare architectural proportions of the old Hall of the House of Representatives, upon which all beholders dwell with delight, and its association with the memories of American statesmen and orators for a half of a century, forbade its demolition or any mutilation of its peculiar elegance and symmetry; and the propriety of its preservation and assignment as a national Statuary Hall seems to have been already vindicated. There was no outlay for a new structure, but merely a law to perpetuate the old. Its unrivaled monolithic columns of brecciated or conglomerate marble, reminding us of an extinct or abandoned quarry on the Gunpowder River, whence these grand specimens appear to have been rescued almost as relics from among the lost arts of nature, will now remain in a hall destined to be quite as sacred as Faneuil Hall or Independence Hall, and where its treasures, unlike those of the Parthenon of Athens, it may be hoped, will forever escape alien as well as domestic spoliation. When the roof shall be replaced by one that will be fire-proof, as the whole of the Capitol manifestly should be, and the sky-light properly enlarged, the fitness of the Hall for its patriotic purposes will be fully demonstrated and scarcely anywhere excelled.

In this Hall once gathered such men as Webster, Clay, and Calhoun, John Randolph, Felix Grundy, and George McDuffie, John C. Spencer, Rollin C. Mallory, and John Quincy Adams, Tristam Burges, Tom. Corwin, and Thad. Stevens, supplemented by a long procession of other brilliant names not without honor in their own country. Here war was declared against Great Britain; here that Navy which superseded gunboats was created; here momentous questions as to the tariff, public lands, and the national bank have been debated and determined; and while the furniture has been and galleries will be removed, the old Hall will forever remain redolent with the eloquence and the well-earned fame of many whose services to the Republic were and are gratefully appreciated.

The contributions of statuary thus far made by the States show that in point of artistic merit they will not be inferior to works chosen by other instrumentalities, and the examples already in place are sufficient to indicate the future imposing grandeur of a silent congress, assembled in marble and bronze, representing some of the most distinguished Americans of a past era, and standing forth here to guard forever the immortality of the Republic. True, there are not yet so many present but that inquiries are made with regret for the absent. When shall we behold Old Hickory from Tennessee, and the great Commoner from Kentucky? Can old Virginia forget John Marshall and Patrick Henry? Are not William Penn and Nathaniel Macon, Oglethorpe and Stark, Tom. Benton and Sam Houston, and Douglas also worthy of conspicuous remembrance among those who are to stand as monuments to the glories, both State and national, of our early history? There are names conspicuously identified with the origin and progress of each State whose fame will not only be likely to endure, but to grow brighter and more valuable with the lapse of time, just as the patriotic treasures of Statuary Hall will become in the centuries we may hope they are destined to endure more and more precious, loved, and revered.

The early history of many of the States is marked by features of enduring as well as of romantic interest, and they have often engaged the attention not only of their own citizens but of the world.

The gravity of the events, military, political, and religious, has furnished abundant themes to historians, orators, and poets, and the lives of the leading men of the times illustrate the proverb that truth is often stranger than fiction. Virginia and Kentucky, Louisiana and Illinois, Pennsylvania and Ohio, each and all have their legendary lore as affectionately and reverently pondered over as that furnished by the Knickerbockers of New York or by the Puritans of New England.

In the days when all were young there appears no more stubbornly independent State than that defended by the Green Mountain Boys, and her early history lacks no element of fascination for either youth or age. Vermont, decorated by Connecticut River on one side and Lake Champlain on the other, was the theater of border war between the English and French, and her thick woods of evergreens and sugar-maples were often traversed by the war-parties of the Adirondacks and Mohawks and the Iroquois, whose disputes about the title to their hunting-grounds may have been quite as bitter and bloody as those of later contending parties. Here women and children were too frequently seized by a stealthy foe and subjected to cruel captivity among savages; and settlers often tilled the soil while their firelocks were kept within reach. Good land could be bought cheaper here than much poorer land in Massachusetts, where it is related that a whole township was sometimes sold "for £460, three barrels of cider, and thirty quarts of rum;" but the early settlers of Vermont not only had to buy their lands, but in order to keep them they had to fight for them. One crusade was no sooner ended than another began. Nor were the savages and wild beasts their most formidable foes. The country had never been explored or surveyed, and charters from the King conflicted and clashed one with another. New Hampshire grants were confused by those of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and were overlapped by those of New York, which was even then aspiring to win the title of "the Empire State." The King in council was perplexed by rival claims. New York had been pushed back by Massachusetts and Connecticut to within twenty miles of the Hudson, but was in no mood to be pushed by Vermont, and had obtained a decision which extended her jurisdiction eastward over the whole of Vermont to the Connecticut River, and now not only claimed jurisdiction but also claimed property rights. To this the hardy settlers would not tamely submit, and successfully resisted. After a struggle of years they secured their property and complete jurisdiction over it and themselves. They had paid Governor Benning Wentworth, of New Hampshire, for their grants, and they resolutely clung to them at all risks. They had added tenfold, sometimes a hundredfold, to their value, and had no idea of any passive surrender. When the courts at Albany decided against them, Allen told their attorney that "the gods of the valleys are not the gods of the hills," and left him not a little bewildered as to what court the land suits were thenceforth to be appealed and adjudicated. When parties came to enforce these decisions they were warned away "on pain of suffering the displeasure of the Green Mountain Boys," and, if they did not obey, the intruders were subjected to the penalty of the "Beach Seal," or, according to Ethan Allen, were "chastised with the twigs of the wilderness." "The transferring or alienation of property," said Allen, "is a sacred prerogative of the true owner—kings and governors cannot intermeddle therewith." When New York offered large rewards for the apprehension of Allen and others, he retaliated by offering a small and contemptuous reward for their obnoxious attorney-general, and stated in his proclamation that "although they have a license by the law aforesaid to kill us, and an indemnification for so doing by the same authority, yet they have no indemnification for so doing from the Green Mountain Boys."

Ethan Allen was one of those marked characters which are the exclusive outgrowth of a new country, grand in proportions and odorous of the forest. He was a chieftain never loth to court danger, a pioneer of rough-and-ready sagacity, and a leader whose will was often the paramount law. In spite of all the adverse statecraft of surrounding colonial governors, supported as he was by a band of fit associates, he achieved success, and must be reckoned as one of the heroic founders of the State. Both his sword and his pen were sharply employed in this service, and his tongue was wont to wake the mountain echoes with "a flood of language" which, if adding little to the graces of history, failed not to fire the hearts of the people.

Allen was born in Connecticut, January 10, 1737, and migrated to Vermont in 1769. He was then thirty-two years of age, in the very prime and beauty of manhood, six feet and four inches in height, and as an athlete would have made no mean figure at the Olympian games of the ancient Greeks. When the young painter Benjamin West, upon going abroad, first saw the statue of Apollo Belvedere, as De Puy relates, he exclaimed, "How like a young Mohawk warrior!" The muscular and well-rounded proportions and gigantic stature of Allen, though perhaps more of a Hercules than of an Apollo, doubtless excited similar admiration at first sight among the pioneers of the embryo State; and this admiration was daily augmented by his resounding words, quaint wit, and daring exploits. His image became indelibly stamped upon the State, and the people, electrified by the recital of his adventures, and always sure that he was no sham, are still proud to claim him as a veritable hero. Fertile in resources as he was himself, there were around him others wiser, even some wiser brothers; but a policy once suggested or determined, he was the engine, always fired up, to swiftly carry it into execution. When he led, a flock of volunteers stood ready to follow. Uncouth as his language might sometimes be, it was never deficient in homely vigor, and he was ever the trusted patriot, whether the question involved was with New Hampshire or New York, with the Canadas or with Congress. There were more than one of the old thirteen States which contributed not more to the independence of our whole country than even the limited and scattered population where Ethan Allen bore so large a sway.

It would be a trespass upon the proprieties of the occasion to present at any length a biography of one whose history every school-boy knows by heart, and yet enough of personal anecdote to indicate a few traits of character may not be out of place. It will be remembered that the January declaration of independence by Vermont amounted to this: "Free and independent of all nations and kingdoms, except the kingdom of God;" but the people were as true to Congress as the needle to the pole. When Allen's brother Levi fled to Canada, Ethan promptly petitioned to have his estate confiscated for the benefit of the State. Levi, hearing of this, challenged his brother to fight a duel; but Ethan refused, on the ground that it would "be disgraceful to fight a tory."

Failing in his expedition to capture Montreal in consequence of the failure of Colonel Brown to co-operate in an attack upon the opposite side of the city, he was captured himself and put on board a vessel of war bound for England. He acknowledges some favors as to his treatment while a prisoner, but bitterly refers to the great "plurality" of the abuse received. While handcuffed and fettered with irons weighing thirty pounds, to which an iron bar was attached eight feet long, upon being insulted he twisted off with his teeth in a fit of anger a tenpenny nail which had been inserted in the bar of his handcuffs, and astonished the lookers-on still more by the torrent of invectives he poured out against those who had given the provocation. After between two and three years' imprisonment he returned to enjoy again the confidence of the people, who found he had served the cause of independence abroad with the same zeal he exhibited at home; and his prominent traits of character had lost none of their peculiar charms, and his words had all of their former tough, gamy energy.

Whether he appeared before Congress in person or by letter, his opinions were no less clear than emphatic. In 1781 he wrote to Congress that—

> I am as resolutely determined to defend the independence of Vermont as Congress is that of the United States; and rather than fail, I will retire with the hardy Green Mountain Boys into the desolate caverns of the mountains, and wage war with human nature at large.

The first man sentenced to be hung in the State had drawn together on the day from remote places a multitude of people to witness the execution; and when, by some official interposition, the execution had been postponed, they became dangerously clamorous that there should be no postponement. Allen thereupon mounted a stump, where this tribune of the people failed not to display his power, telling them all, in conclusion, to go home and come back upon a certain day, "when they should see somebody hung, if not the prisoner, he would be hung himself." Thus law and order prevailed.

A catalogue of the literary, political, and theological works of Allen, however useful and pungent at the time some part of them may have been, are not calculated to add much to his fame. He was for a time a free-thinker, and felt that he should be as well treated, as he said himself, in "the world of spirits as other gentlemen of my merit."

There are other incidents in the life of Allen of greater consequence and of not less personal significance than those I have enumerated, requiring, however, too much space to present; but the one which gives most luster to his name and which the statue presented by Vermont is intended to honor, is that of Ticonderoga, and occurred more than a year prior to our national Declaration of Independence.

Our grievances with the mother country had multiplied without diminishing those of the settlers in Vermont, and had also enlarged the ambition of Colonel Allen, by giving him what he called a "relish for martial glory." Already widely known as a brave defender of the rights of his fellow-men, he at once espoused the cause of American liberty, and contributed his full share not only to the independence of his State, but to the independence of the United States, and in that behalf won the first victory of the Revolution.

The battle of Lexington was fought April 19, 1775; and Massachusetts, the hot-bed of rebellion, with Connecticut, burned to retaliate, and with that end in view both conceived the idea of seizing upon Fort Ticonderoga. But when their limited expedition arrived in Vermont they found Colonel Allen and his Green Mountain Boys organized for the same enterprise, and they would have no other leader.

On the 9th of May, 1775, having made a forced march from Bennington, two hundred and thirty strong, they arrived at the lake opposite to Ticonderoga. There they had great difficulty in procuring boats, and only got the officers and eighty-three men across as the day began to dawn on the morning of the 10th. No time was to be lost. Allen briefly harangued his men in a speech, which if not as classic as that of Napoleon at the battle of the Pyramids, was effective enough to make at least one century look back upon him. He told them it was "a desperate attempt; which none but the bravest men dare attempt. I do not urge it on any contrary to his will. You that will undertake voluntarily, poise your firelocks!" It is needless to say that every man poised his firelock. At the head of his center file, Colonel Allen led the way to the wicket-gate, where the sentry, after snapping his fusee at him in vain, retreated, but closely pursued by Allen and his comrades to the interior of the fort. The garrison were surprised. Allen rushed to the lodgings of the commander, Captain Delaplace, and ordered him to come forth instantly or he would sacrifice the whole garrison. "At which," to use the words of Allen, "the captain came immediately to the door with his breeches in his hand, when I ordered him to deliver me the fort instantly. He asked me by what authority I demanded it; I answered him, 'In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!'"

The prompt surrender of "old Ticonderoga" followed, together with the garrison of about fifty men and officers, one hundred pieces of cannon, one mortar, and a number of swivels. The next step was to send part of the force to Crown Point, which was easily captured, having only a few men, but with an armament about equal to that of Ticonderoga. "This surprise," in the words of Allen, "was carried into execution in the gray of the morning of the 10th of May, 1775. The sun seemed to rise that morning with superior luster, and Ticonderoga and its dependencies smiled to its conquerors, who tossed about the flowing bowl and wished success to Congress and the liberty and freedom of America."

The point of time happily chosen by the sculptor, Larkin G. Mead, to represent the hero, appears to have been just after he knocked at the door of the commander of the fort and had ordered him with thundering voice to come forth instantly or the whole garrison would be sacrificed. There was a moment of suspense; the invaders, with cocked guns, stood in line ready for any fray; Allen not knowing what might yet remain to be encountered, but with his sword firmly grasped, and his left arm and hand clinched across his breast, stands like a giant, conscious of some power to crush a foe, sternly resolved to crush or be crushed, and nothing loth to proclaim the exalted sources of his authority.

It will be generally admitted, I think, that the conception of character by the artist is truthful, and that it has been displayed with wonderful skill and vigor. The costume is in close harmony with the times, the sash having been copied from one he wore, and all the details are handled and finished in the highest style of art. If there was anything lacking in the life or character of Allen necessary to perpetuate his memory, it would seem to have been supplied by the genius of the sculptor.

Vermont tenders this offering with that holiest sentiment of the human heart, which would honor the great deeds of ancestors in order that they may be emulated by future generations, and tenders it also to strengthen the bonds of affection which may serve to unite and cement together our great sisterhood of States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, what may be fitly said on an occasion like this must be brief and necessarily inadequate to a full portrayal of the chief qualities and deeds of the men to whom, by statues and orations, we make grateful memorial.

Wherever civilization, even in its earliest germs, has found a footing, an instinctive sentiment has led to the endeavor to perpetuate the memory of those who have been leaders, and have impressed their individuality upon the progress of society, by effigies in some enduring material that should give to succeeding generations a vivid idea of their personality and, as far as possible, of their most noble acts.

In the long career of mankind, when written accounts of battles and triumphs and rulers have passed away, there still appear to us, exhumed from the bosom of the all-embracing earth, the portraits in bronze or more enduring marble of the great actors in founding states, in contests, in government, and the progress of arts, from the very morning of the world.

Italy gives to us not only the monuments and statues of imperial and republican Rome, but also mementoes of that dim and earlier civilization, the marks of which are found so abundantly in the pictorial inscriptions upon the Etruscan vases and other ceramic works.

The old Assyria opens to our gaze the treasures of Nineveh and the most instructive examples of the culture and progress of her early dynasties, while Egypt furnishes from the heart of her pyramids sculptures and inscriptions that give information of her ancient career that otherwise would have been long lost; and Troy, mythical or real, unbosoms from her thrice-buried walls the story of Priam and his sons; and but for the objects in pottery and in stone found in so many parts of our Western World its history beyond four centuries would have remained practically a blank. Dim as is the light that these old memorials give, it is far better than the impenetrable darkness that would exist without them.

It is even now, perhaps, not too much to say that the people who would send something of their history to the remotest generations will do it not so much by treatises or manuscripts or printing upon paper or by solemn archives of parchment as by objects shaped by cunning hands in bronze or stone, expressing the story of human experience and human endeavor that will appeal to the understanding and sympathies of distant ages by suggestion and symbol, rather than by consecutive narrative.

If this be so, the placing of a statue in the grand historic Hall of the Capitol is not merely a ceremony calculated to gratify the pride of a State, but it is a contribution to the most enduring of historic records. We then dedicate this heroic statue of a hero not only as a memorial of gratitude for his great services to his State and country, but also as an enduring contribution to the history of the times when States founded upon high principles of republican liberty were being created in the new world, devoted as it must seem by Providence to the establishment and development of equal rights among men.

Ethan Allen was a man of gifts rather than acquirements, although he was not by any mean deficient in that knowledge obtained from reading and from intercourse with men. But it was the natural force of his character that made him eminent among the worthies who founded the Republic and pre-eminent in that little band of brave and intelligent men who, by the sheer force and intensity of their true devotion to the protection of the rights and interests of the Green Mountain Boys, founded the State of Vermont.

The disorders that led to the formation of the State began at a date earlier by some years than the Declaration of Independence. They arose from the local and apparently trifling circumstance of conflicting land grants made respectively by the colonial governors of New Hampshire and New York.

It happened by that destiny that is sometimes said to do nothing amiss that Ethan Allen and his coadjutors upheld the grants of the governor of New Hampshire and resisted those of the governor of New York, although the latter were in point of strict law possibly the better title. In the midst of those troubles, while the settlers under the New Hampshire grants were defending their possessions and homes by force against the New York claimants, the contest between the colonies and the British government culminated in open rebellion.

A few weeks after the battles of Lexington and Concord Ethan Allen, acting under the suggestion of the General Assembly of Connecticut, from which colony the New Hampshire grants had been chiefly peopled, with a force of only two hundred and thirty men, surprised and captured the British fortress of Ticonderoga, within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the colony of New York, thus obtaining the first affirmative triumph of the Revolution in and for the colony whose government had, as he and his fellow-settlers believed, trampled with cruelty and oppression upon their rights. The circumstances of the capture were dramatic in the highest degree; they are familiar to all and need not be repeated at large. But it was significant, as it has been in recent times, that the drawn sword was necessary to make effective the authority of Congress; when the gray morning of victory opened, as Allen himself expressed it, with a sunrise of "superior luster," and with libations for "success to Congress and the liberty and freedom of America."

After a few months devoted to defending the possessions of his fellow-settlers, as well as to the interests of the general cause of the colonies, we find him with that desperate daring characteristic of his nature, although holding no regular commission under Congress, taking the most difficult and dangerous service under Generals Schuyler and Montgomery, against Montreal.

In the course of this duty, and really through the failure of the supporting troops, he was captured in attempting the reduction of that town. He was taken to England and thence to South Carolina, and kept a prisoner until he was finally exchanged. During this period he was made to submit in every way to the extremist rigor ever practiced in civilized warfare upon a captive whose status was undefined. The British officials, in the doubt that existed whether he should be executed as a traitor or held as a prisoner of war, seemed determined that he should suffer more than the punishment of both conditions, and subjected him to every privation and misery, and heaped upon him daily contumely and insult; but the high spirit of a brave man and patriot rose in exact proportion to the cruelties showered upon him. Undismayed and unsubdued he asserted the liberty of speech (the only liberty left to him) with that rough but caustic wit and good sense that commanded the respect of those who were the instruments of his oppression. Exchanged at last at New York, in May, 1778, after reporting to General Washington at Valley Forge, he returned to Bennington, Vermont, "the capital of the Green Mountain Boys," where, as he says in his narrative, he "arrived on the evening of the last of May, to their great surprise; for I was to them as one rose from the dead, and now both their joy and mine was complete. Three cannon were fired that evening, and next morning Colonel Herrick gave orders, and fourteen more were discharged, welcoming me to Bennington: thirteen for the United States and one for young Vermont."

No sooner had he reached his home than he took again his acknowledged place as the chief leader of the Green Mountain Boys in their unhappy contest with their neighbors of New York and in the great cause of freedom for all the States.

Almost at that moment of time the affairs of Vermont took the completed form of a constitutional, organized, and independent government, the first election under a written constitution having taken place on the first Tuesday of March, 1778. But New York, as well as New Hampshire indeed, was unwilling to give up her pretensions to dominion over the beautiful and fertile valley of Lake Champlain and the magnificent country of hill and mountain between it and the Connecticut.

Congress, too, turning its face, as is always natural, toward the most powerful claimant, inclined to ignore the independence of Vermont, while the British forces in Canada constantly threatened the young Republic with disaster and destruction. Then the bold and reckless soldier Allen was transformed into the astute and wily diplomatist, and he set off against each other the pretensions of New York and New Hampshire and the claims of Massachusetts to the territory of Vermont and at the same time negotiated with the British authorities to such purpose that he protected the whole northern frontier from invasion, and so rendered, as he intended, the best possible service to the general cause, although the conduct of Congress and New York and New Hampshire might have excused the infant State, beset on every side, in securing her own interests alone by an easy arrangement with the British Crown.

After infinite difficulty and delay, during which the great spirit of Allen chiefly sustained and encouraged the Vermonters to hold fast to their position of independent equality, Congress and the contending parties acceded to her demands, and Vermont, among the first-born of separate and independent States on this continent, became in 1791 also the first star added to the constellation of the American Union.

To be the founder of a free state is perhaps the greatest fortune that can happen to any man. Ethan Allen can be justly described as such. Others of his compeers, such as Warner, Baker, Cochran, and the Fays, were also illustrious chiefs and leaders, but to Allen more than to any other one belongs, I think, the honor of the achievement; and in this character his name is now a household word among all the inhabitants of the State; and it is also honored and revered in every part of our Union as that of one of the boldest and most persistent spirits of the Revolution.

When peace and order and independence had been obtained, Allen quietly and gladly retired from public service, and occupied the short remainder of his life in the simple pursuits of a husbandman near Burlington. He expired on the 12th of February, 1789, and was buried in the cemetery of Green Mount, in that town, where his State, in grateful appreciation of his services, has erected to his memory a monumental column, now surmounted by a statue the voluntary offering of citizens of the State.

The State now places in the Capitol his statue as a fit and most enduring record not only of the great and beneficent events in which he bore so conspicuous a part, but of the personality of one who in times of the greatest difficulty and peril developed for the service of the Republic the qualities of a leader and a patriot. May it, like its companions in that old historic Hall, be to Americans not only a memorial, but an inspiration for liberty and equality under the law, which alone can bear our country safely through the unknown future.

The resolution was concurred in.

NATIONAL-BANK RECEIVERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was a mistake made in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, in numbering one of the amendments. No. 11 was inserted instead of No. 10. I ask the Secretary to make the change in the record so as to conform with the fact. The engrossing clerk discovered the error. The correction ought to be communicated also to the House, so that the number may be changed there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made, and the Secretary will communicate the correction to the House.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ANDREW J. BARRETT.

Mr. CAPERTON. I move to take up House bill No. 648 for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that bill will not be taken up. I am very anxious to get to a matter of general importance. I ask a division on taking it up.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before the division is taken I wish to make one suggestion. I suppose the object of the Senator from Vermont is to ascertain whether we have a quorum before we proceed with any business. I am not in favor of proceeding with any business unless we have such a quorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That result will be reached by a division.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest whether it would not be better simply to take up the Calendar of unobjected cases without a division, and let the struggle to obtain the floor on individual cases come up after it is ascertained we have a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to proceed to the consideration of the bill which he has named.

The question being taken by a division, the ayes were 22, and the noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAPERTON. If the Senator from Vermont will hear the bill read he will see that it is proper. It will not take a minute to dispose of it. It was referred to the committee about two months ago, and was considered by them and reported favorably. It only involves the small sum of $154.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot ascertain whether it is proper and right until it is taken up, so that we can hear the report read.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cragin, Eaton, Ferry, Hamilton, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Withers, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Dawes, and Edmunds—4.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, West, Whyte, and Windom—36.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Andrew J. Barrett the sum of $154, in payment of draft numbered 3609 on the United States depository at Richmond, Virginia, drawn by Peter A. Kellar, the disbursing agent, upon W. M. Harrison, the officer in charge of the United States depository at that place, in favor of Andrew J. Barrett: the draft bearing date January 28, 1861, and being for the first payment for taking the eighth census.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims May 22:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

A draft for $154 was drawn by Peter A. Kellar, disbursing agent for the eighth census, on the 28th of January, 1861, in favor of Andrew J. Barrett, then assistant United States marshal, in Virginia, for payment in part to him for services rendered in taking this census, and drawn on W. M. Harrison, in charge of the United States depository at Richmond, Virginia. Mr. Barrett gave his receipt for the draft, and the amount was charged to him on settlement of his final account as census-taker.

Soon after receiving it, in the course of some business transaction, he paid the same to William Thompson, sheriff of Boone County, Virginia, as money. The draft lay in Mr. Thompson's hands for a long time, and when he attempted to use it by turning it over to J. M. Bennet, the auditor of public accounts of Virginia, Mr. Bennet refused to take it. Mr. Thompson attempted to get it cashed at the United States Treasury, but was told that the account of Mr. Barrett had been closed and that the Department did not feel authorized to re-open it, and the payment was again refused. Mr. Thompson then returned the draft to Mr. Barrett, who redeemed it in full, and now asks the passage of a bill for his relief. Correspondence with the Treasury Department shows that while the justice of the claim is not denied, yet under the rules for keeping and closing accounts they cannot now pay the same.

The committee being satisfied that Mr. Barrett has never received full compensation due him in the amount named in the bill, viz, $154, recommend its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a most extraordinary statement. I should like to ask the gentleman who reported this bill one or two questions. One of them is whether Mr. Andrew J. Barrett, in whose favor this draft was drawn, and who received it against a fund that was there in Richmond ready to respond to it, presented it for payment? This was on the 28th of January, 1861, it appears, and I suppose he got the draft within a day or two. The State of Virginia went out, or tried to go out, some time in the spring, I suppose.

Mr. ALLISON. In April.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is very well known to everybody who hears me that a very large sum of the moneys of the United States, a part of which would have been paid over on this draft if it had been presented to the drawee at once, was turned over to the confederated State of Virginia, and by her applied to making war against the United States.

I should be glad to have the chairman of the committee or somebody tell me upon what principle it is that this gentleman living in Richmond, this draft having been drawn against a fund that was there and ready to respond, did not present his draft for a long time, if at all, until the public enemy had taken possession of the money and used it. When I get that question answered I have one or two more to present.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to say with reference to this bill that I shall have to plead entire ignorance upon the subject for the reason that it passed the committee at a time when I was not present. The Senator from West Virginia, who called the bill up, is, of course, familiar with all the circumstances, and I shall not pretend to answer the question that has been suggested. This is a bill, as I remarked, which passed the committee at a time when I was absent from the city, and I do not know anything about the particulars.

Mr. CAPERTON. The report was made by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON.] I know nothing about the case except the facts set forth in the report. It seems to me there ought not to be any question about the payment of the debt. This party had rendered the service to the United States Government, and he was paid in a draft. For the reasons set forth in the report he could not obtain his money, and the only question is whether it is due to him and proper that it should be paid to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The law and justice, if I correctly understand the law and appreciate sentiments of justice, are perfectly in accord, that where a man who owes another draws a draft in his favor, a check on the bank, (for that is what this case is, it being on the assistant treasurer at Richmond,) where he has funds for the payment of that check or draft, and does not present it for payment within a reasonable time, and that in a matter of payment is as soon as the course of ordinary business will bring it around, and the bank fails and the money is lost, the man who owed the debt and gave the draft is discharged in law, and justice, too. Here the United States held the money devoted for this purpose in the hands of its public depository in Richmond. It gave this man an order on it for payment, he living in Richmond. He neglected to present this order, as this report states, he never presented it, and by and by, three or four months after, the State of Virginia "scoops," as they say out West, the whole of that money into her treasury and disposed of it. Can it be said there is any justice in going back and calling on the drawer of that draft to make it good? It is certainly not the law in commercial countries, if I correctly understand it.

Then there is another circumstance. I should be glad to have the Senator from West Virginia, who probably knows or can ascertain, inform me what became of Mr. Andrew J. Barrett. If it should turn out that Mr. Andrew J. Barrett, being a man of function down there, was one of the very people who assisted in abstracting this money from the United States depository and turning it over to the confederated authorities, then I think, and an additional principle of equity might come in, that he would not have any strong claim upon the Treasury of the United States. I think that is a fact that ought to be ascertained. We ought to know the whole history of this transaction, because, I repeat, that it is publicly known, it is notorious, that a great many thousand dollars of the money of the United States in the possession of this Mr. Harrison was taken possession of by the confederate State of Virginia and appropriated to her use in carrying on military and other operations. That being a notorious fact, we ought certainly to have a very careful inquiry, in order to know what diligence this man used to get his money, why he did not present his draft, and whether he had anything to do with the seizure of this property and cash of the United States and turning it over; because if he had I take it everybody would agree that it is no part of our business to pay him over again. He would be taken to have had a chance to get his money.

There is another curious thing here. It appears that Barrett paid this draft over to William Thompson, sheriff of Boone County. The draft lay in Thompson's hands for a long time and when he attempted to use it by turning it over to J. M. Bennett, the auditor of public accounts of Virginia, Mr. Bennett refused to take it. I suppose Mr. Bennett, the auditor of public accounts of Virginia, after this long time, which I take it was during the rebellion, did not wish to take as cash a draft drawn by the United States on its money in the hands of Harrison, the United States depositary, which the State of Virginia had already entirely absorbed. She had already got the money, and he did not propose to allow this draft against it.

I think that we should be setting a very extraordinary example of the administration of public justice to private claimants if we pay this sum, which, to be sure, is small, but the principle is a great one, to this man until we know something more of the history which attends this transaction; because it will not be at all surprising if it turns out that this Mr. Barrett was one of the confederates who assisted to capture this money against which he had this draft and turn it over to the confederate authorities. If he did, I suppose his best friend would not claim that he ought to have it again. If he did not, then these other questions that I have named will arise.

I hope the Senator will not press the bill at this time, but let it go over.

Mr. CAPERTON. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the fact, unknown probably to him, that the residence of this man Barrett was about three hundred miles from the city of Richmond. The Government chose to give him a draft on the depository at Richmond, when it might have given him a draft on the depository at Cincinnati, within two or three hours' ride from his home. He transferred that draft with a view to discharge some of his liabilities to the State government in the payment of taxes. It was some time in getting down to the city of Richmond, and that accounts for the delay. As to what part Mr. Barrett had in taking possession of the funds belonging to the United States Government I do not know anything.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which side was he on in the rebellion?

Mr. CAPERTON. I do not know that. It is perfectly manifest that he rendered the service, and the Government assented to pay him his claim; but it has not paid him, and the amount is still due for his services. It is for the Congress of the United States to say whether he shall have the money or not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that, in all cases of confiscation by government, the legal claims which exist against the confiscated property by the citizens of the confiscating government are respected. I believe that is a universal rule in civilized governments. If the funds of the Government against which this draft was drawn were confiscated in aid of the rebellion and if the claimant was a party to that confiscation and withheld his draft out of affection for the cause to which the fund was confiscated, it seems to me it would be very wrong to deprive him of the merit and the fame of that patriotic act by paying it over again. If, on the other hand, he was a citizen loyal to the Government, and not a party to the confiscation, but was prevented by circumstances beyond his own control from presenting the draft, I should be in favor of paying it over again. Upon that point I am not sufficiently informed to be able to vote. I listened to the reading of the report, but it does not disclose the facts to which I refer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the bill will be postponed. It ought not to pass in its present condition, because it is plain that this man held a draft that would have been paid if presented in due course. He must have held it for three or five months without presentation and then presented it to the captors of the money, who refused to pay it. It seems to me that unless he explains the long delay between January and May, if that was the time when the draft was refused by the authorities of Virginia, he is clearly not entitled to the money, and by the commercial law of any State or any country he has lost his right to it. If in the mean time the fund on hand at the time of the drawing had been stolen or lost in any way he would have lost the money by his neglect. It seems to me we ought not to set a precedent of that kind unless the cause of delay is clearly explained.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to make an inquiry. If the Senator from West Virginia proposes to press this bill to its passage now, I wish to say a very few words in connection with it. If he does not intend to press it, I shall not take up the time of the Senate. I suggest to him, however, that, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] who reported the bill and is familiar with all the circumstances, is not present, perhaps it might be as well not to insist on its passage at this time. I think there are matters in connection with this report which would be a complete answer to very much that has been said and which it is very proper to answer. The inquiry with reference to the status of this person toward the Government may not be sufficiently answered by the report; and yet I have thought that perhaps in that respect there is a sufficient answer, as the report found in his favor. We know perfectly well that we never have reported in favor of any person who occupied a doubtful status toward the Government. The Department itself says this is a just claim and ought to be paid and would be paid but that his accounts were closed. But, all the circumstances considered, I suggest to my friend whether it would not be well to have the bill passed over until the Senator who reported it shall be present.

Mr. CAPERTON. I have no objection to letting it take that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed back on the Calendar, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

REDEMPTION OF UNUSED STAMPS.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1100) relative to the redemption of unused stamps. I will ask the clerk to read the bill and the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Pratt; which, very likely, will be satisfactory. The bill is reported unanimously from the Finance Committee.

Mr. THURMAN. Unless the Senate is disposed to go on with the Calendar of unobjected cases, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. KERNAN. I suggest that the letter of the Commissioner be read, and then we can see if the Senate will not pass the bill. It is a House bill and has been here a good while. Only a few persons are interested in it.

Mr. THURMAN. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The letter cannot be read until we get the bill up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York to take up the bill named by him.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 25, noes 4; no quorum voting.

Mr. KERNAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no quorum here, and we might as well adjourn. I think we had better give up business for to-day. We shall have no quorum, I think. As I have some friends who ought to be allowed to consult with the delegates on their way to Cincinnati, I think it would facilitate business to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator mean Cincinnati or Saint Louis? [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. I mean Cincinnati. [Laughter.] I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 13; and (at one o'clock and twenty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 10, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. C. C. SNIFFEN, his Private Secretary, who also announced that the President had approved a joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) granting the use of artillery blankets, &c., at the national soldiers reunion at Caldwell, Ohio; and

An act (H. R. No. 2447) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1071) for the relief of Lieutenant James B. Sinclair, United States Army.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Department of State in relation to the construction of the extradition treaty with Great Britain.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th day of March last, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, which presents the correspondence and condition of the question up to the day of its date.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, June 10, 1876.

The message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AGREEMENT WITH SIOUX NATION.

Mr. BOONE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes, in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TAXES PAID BY BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY, ETC.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to offer the resolution of inquiry which I send to the desk.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. This is simply a resolution of inquiry. I trust the gentleman will allow it to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information, after which objections to its present consideration will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, if not incompatible with the public service, be, and he is hereby, requested to report to this House the amount of internal-revenue taxes paid by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and its branches and by the Central Pacific Railroad Company and its branches from the 1st day of July, A. D. 1864, to the 31st day of December, A. D. 1871, on undivided profits, on profits used for construction or improvements, or carried to the account of any fund.

Mr. BLAND. I have no objection to that.

There being no further objection, the resolution was agreed to.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3019) for the relief of William R. Wilmer, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland; and the same was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills and petitions; and the same were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

The bill (H. R. No. 3236) for the relief of Robert L. Lindsay, late captain of the Fiftieth Regiment Missouri Volunteers;

The bill (H R. No. 3529) for the relief of Dr. Mary E. Walker;

The bill (H. R. No. 3357) for the relief of Mary and Albert F. Lavalette, executors of the estate of Elie A. F. Lavalette, deceased;

The bill (H. R. No. 1098) for the relief of Charles H. Frank;

The petition of John J. Busby; and

The petition of Robert E. Finnel, for goods furnished the United States Army during the rebellion.

RANGE-LIGHT IN MAUMEE BAY.

Mr. KEHR. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back the bill (H. R. No. 2898) to provide for the construction of a range-light in Maumee Bay, Ohio, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and to move that the bill and substitute, together with the report of the committee and the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I am directed by the Committee of Accounts to report the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be, and they are hereby, allowed to retain the services of a clerk for the period of thirty days from the expiration of the present term.

Mr. KASSON. Is it intended that the services of this clerk shall be retained after the expiration of the present session?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Not at all. I will modify the resolution so as to make that clear.

The resolution was modified accordingly, and, as modified, was agreed to.

ENTRY OF GOODS AT INTERMEDIATE PORTS.

Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3687) to amend section 3117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to entry of goods taken or delivered at intermediate ports; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AND FOG-BELL ON ROUND ISLAND.

Mr. DURAND. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably the bill (S. No. 676) authorizing the construction of a light-house and fog-bell on Round Island, Straits of Mackinac, and move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3396) donating one condemned cannon and carriage to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3570) granting condemned iron cannon for a monument to General Kearney; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN NEW MEXICO AND COLORADO.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back an executive document in reference to the lines of communication between Northern New Mexico and Southern Colorado; and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MEDICAL CORPS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. No. 320) to reduce the number and increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the United States Army.

I will say that an exactly similar bill has already passed the House, and the Committee on Military Affairs agreed unanimously to it. I ask that the bill be passed at this time; but if any one wishes to discuss it, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill now?

No objection was made.

The bill was read. It reduces the number of assistant surgeons now allowed by law to one hundred and twenty-five; abolishes the office of medical store-keeper; and provides, in addition to the grades now allowed by law, for four surgeons with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels; eight surgeons with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonels, to be promoted by seniority from the medical officers of the Army. That the act shall not be construed to deprive any medical officer or store-keeper now in office of his commission in the United States Army.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN COLORADO.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Territories the bill (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado; and if necessary, I will make a short statement in reference to the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let us hear the bill read.

The bill was read. It provides for the establishment of a district court in Colorado when admitted as a State.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman, being a Delegate, has no right to make that motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report adversely on two bills.

Mr. KNOTT. I must insist on the regular order. I want the morning hour for the call of the Committee on the Judiciary.

OATHS TO JURORS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour commences at ten minutes to one o'clock, and the regular order of business is the calling of committees for reports. The call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary, and the pending bill is the bill (H. R. No. 1442) to repeal section 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and to provide an oath for grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States.

The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KNOTT. On that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. I now move that the bill and the pending amendments be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KASSON. That is right.

Mr. KNOTT's motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. KNOTT, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 353) to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, with a recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out "the" where it occurs the second time.

In lines 3 and 4 strike out the words "of the United States." Amend the title so as to read:

An act to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. LYNDE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (S. No. 332) to amend an act entitled an act to amend and supplement an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes, approved June 22, 1874, with an amendment.

The committee reported the following amendment:

That section 5108 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

Mr. LYNDE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 692) to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress.

The bill provides that the Secretary of War may apply so much of the $25,000 appropriated in the second section of the act of March 3, 1875, to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin, as may be necessary to pay the salaries of the commissioners to assess the damages for property so taken, &c.

Mr. LYNDE. I will state that by the second section of the act of March 3, 1875, $25,000 was appropriated for the Fox and Wisconsin river improvement, to be applied for the payment of the property taken and the expenses provided for in the previous section. The act further provided that commissioners should assess the damages for property taken or overflowed, and this bill merely provides that those commissioners, who have already acted, may be paid by the Secretary of War out of the $25,000 heretofore appropriated; it makes no new appropriation at all.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. LYNDE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2860) with a favorable recommendation, to facilitate and encourage philosophical, mechanical, and scientific exhibitions and experiments at the centennial exhibition.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no work of art, or production of mechanical skill or labor, or any pattern, design, or model for manufacture, or any tool, implement, machine, or device for the manufacture, either in whole or in part, of any useful or ornamental fabric or article, shall be liable to be levied upon, seized, or taken, nor shall the same be levied upon, seized, or taken, under or by virtue of any writ or process issued by any court of the United States, or any judge thereof, while the same shall be on exhibition, or be used in any philosophical, mechanical, or scientific experiment, at the centennial exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia during the year 1876, or while the same is being transported to said city for such exhibition; nor shall any writ or any process issued out of any court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, be effectual, or operate to prevent or restrain, or be construed to prevent or restrain, the exhibition, or the making for exhibition, at said centennial exhibition, of any work of art, or any production of mechanical skill or labor, or any pattern, model, or design for manufacture, or any tool, implement, or machine for the manufacture, either in whole or in part, of any useful or ornamental article or fabric, or to prevent or restrain any philosophical, mechanical, or scientific exhibition or experiment which may be made at said centennial exhibition under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the proper officers or managers thereof: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any person other than the inventor thereof or his agents or assigns to exhibit any new and useful improvement, combination, or mechanical contrivance not heretofore manufactured and sold.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LYNDE. The only object of this bill is to enable parties who are inventors of machines or philosophical apparatus to exhibit at the centennial exhibition the machines of which they claim to be inventors without being interrupted by parties who may claim that such machine is an infringement upon previous patents; and the bill applies only during the exhibition. There is a great deal of feeling, as is well known, between parties who have patents for machines accomplishing the same object, and there may be a conflict between them as to whether the patentee is the original inventor of the machine. This bill is to prevent the getting out of an injunction prohibiting the exhibition of such a machine at the centennial exhibition. It has nothing to do with the ultimate settlement of the rights of the parties, but merely to permit the exhibition of such machines during the continuance of the centennial exhibition.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LYNDE, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2812, a bill (H. R. No. 3688) to amend an act entitled "An act supplementary to the acts in relation to immigration," approved March 3, 1875; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that section 5 of the act entitled "An act supplementary to the acts in relation to immigration," approved March 3, 1875, shall be amended by adding the following:

When any two citizens shall file with the collector of any port of the United States an affidavit stating that they have reason to believe that on board any vessel or vessels arriving at said port there are persons prohibited from landing by this act, it shall be the duty of said collector to make or cause to be made the inspection provided for in this act; and every collector or inspection officer who willfully refuses or neglects to make such inspection or to enforce the provisions of this act shall be punishable by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, or by imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than one year: Provided, That this amendment shall not be so construed as to relieve the collectors of ports from causing the inspection of vessels as provided for in the original section, though no affidavit be made as required by this amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] state what are the provisions of the act of which this is amendatory.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LYNDE. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. This bill, just reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, is intended to carry into effect the act of 1875, is it not?

Mr. LYNDE. It is.

Mr. PAGE. It does not change the law in any particular, only renders the act of 1875 operative.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] state what the original act is.

Mr. LYNDE. The section in regard to which the gentleman from Minnesota asks reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for aliens of the following classes to immigrate into the United States, namely, persons who are undergoing a sentence for conviction in their own country of felonious crimes other than political or growing out of or the result of such political offenses, or whose sentence has been remitted on condition of their emigration, and women "imported for the purposes of prostitution," &c.

This section is intended to prevent the immigration into this country of those classes; but there is no provision in the existing law compelling the collecter to make an inspection of vessels supposed to contain persons of this description. It is provided that the collector may inspect such vessels and prevent their landing; but there is no mode of enforcing the section. This amendatory bill is simply for the purpose of enforcing that inspection where two citizens of the port make affidavit that they have reason to believe persons of these classes are upon the vessel.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House presenting the thanks of Congress to the governor, and through him to the people, of the State of Vermont, for the statue of Ethan Allen.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had corrected a clerical error in the second and third paragraphs of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, by changing the number of the Senate amendment from eleven to ten.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The message just received announces that the Senate has amended the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, by changing the number of a Senate amendment from eleven to ten. If there be no objection, the amendment will be concurred in by the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DAMAGES FOR INFRINGEMENT OF PATENTS.

Mr. LYNDE. A few days ago the bill (H. R. No. 3370) to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringement of patents was reported, with amendments, for the purpose of printing and recommitment. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted, in order that it may be put on its passage.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion to recommit, it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is now before the House. The first question is upon the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LYNDE. Before the bill and amendments are read, I will explain that the bill provides that hereafter in suits for infringement of patents the complainant shall be entitled to recover damages for only one year previous to giving notice to the defendant that he is infringing the patent. The great difficulty now existing is that when a patentee claims that parties are infringing his patent, such parties, who may have been using the invention innocently, supposing themselves the inventors or the licensees of the original patentees, may be compelled to pay damages for a long term of years, because the original inventor has waited for years before bringing his suit.

In some cases large amounts of money have been invested and large manufacturing establishments built upon the belief that a party holding the patent of the Government for a certain machine was the real inventor, when in point of fact the prior right to the invention was claimed by another party. This bill provides that where such a party brings suit for infringement, he shall not be permitted to recover damages for more than one year previous to the time of having notified the defendant that he claims there is an infringement. This will enable the defendant to make inquiry into the right of the plaintiff to the patent, to determine whether he is infringing or not, and then either to settle or abide the consequences; for after notice is given the party may rest as long as he sees fit before he brings his action. The bill further provides that where no notice is actually given, the commencement of the suit shall be considered notice.

Mr. EDEN. Suppose that the plantiff has had no notice of an infringement which has been going on for a long time. In that case does he have no remedy under this bill? Such infringement may occur in a distant part of the country, and the owner of the patent may for a long time have no information of the fact.

Mr. LYNDE. Well, sir, the owners of patents are very apt to find out when there is any infringement; for where the patent is really of any value they have their agents and attorneys all through the United States. The evil which may arise in such a case as that supposed by the gentleman, does not begin to compare with the evil now felt by manufacturers who have suits brought against them when they had no idea that they were infringing anybody's patent.

Mr. EDEN. It seems to me that in such cases as I have supposed great injustice may be done to the owners of patents.

Mr. LYNDE. Our patent laws confer especial privileges upon these parties; and of course there is no injustice in making such provisions as will protect manufacturers and the people generally against any abuse which may arise in this way, or against the improper recovery of damages where the parties using the patents are entirely innocent. Every lawyer who is accustomed to patent suits understands very well that in almost all of these patent cases there is a nice question as to whether the defendant is infringing or not. The Government goes on issuing patent after patent; and the party holding a patent of subsequent date may believe he is the holder of the original patent; and yet somebody previously having the patent brings a suit against this subsequent patentee, and claims that this subsequent patent is an infringement of his, and shuts up his shop or his manufacturing establishment. He has a right to close it entirely and destroy his property. Now this law merely provides that he must give notice to the party or else he should only be entitled to recover damages for one year previous to the suit being brought.

I ask that the amendments of the committee be agreed to, and that the bill as amended be put upon its passage.

Mr. COCHRANE. This is a very important bill, and ought to be considered carefully by the House. I ask that it may be read by the clerk.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would suggest that it would be more intelligible to the House if the Clerk will read the bill as it is proposed to be amended by the committee. If so read I think the House will understand it better.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be read as proposed to be amended by the committee.

There was no objection.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the plaintiff in any action at law or proceeding in equity, if found entitled in such proceeding or action to recover damages for infringement of any patent, shall recover only for such damages for infringement as shall have occurred for and during the term of one year immediately preceding the notice of infringement, and after such notice shall be given and until the date of the judgment: Provided, That, where no other notice of infringement shall be given, the commencement of a suit for such infringement shall be construed as notice.

SEC. 2. That the measure of the plaintiff's damages shall be the same in law and in equity; and the rule in all cases shall be to give to the plaintiff, as far as possible, a reasonable recompense for his time, labor, ingenuity, and expense. Where a reasonable recompense in form of a license fee has been established, that shall be taken as the measure of damages; and, where no such license fee has been established, the court or jury may determine, from the evidence, what would be a reasonable license fee, according to the circumstances of the case. And, whenever the court shall be of opinion that the damages ought to be increased, the court may increase the same, not exceeding, however, three times the amount of the license fee, as shown, together with the costs. And the court shall have power, when necessary to prevent injustice, to diminish the damages in like manner. And no other recovery for damages or profits shall be allowed except as provided in this section.

SEC. 3. That every patent, or any interest therein, shall be assignable in law, by an instrument in writing; and the patentee, or his assigns or legal representatives, may, in like manner, grant and convey an exclusive right under the patent for the whole or any specified part of the United States, or may grant licenses under said patent, exclusive or otherwise, as the parties may agree. And when there are two or more joint owners, or owners in common, of any patent, a license from any one of said owners shall be good and valid in law, and shall vest in the licensee full right to the said invention, according to the terms of said license, unless the conveyance or other instrument creating such joint ownership, or ownership in common, shall provide that no license shall be valid unless executed by all of such owners, or unless an agreement to that effect shall be made by said owners, and filed for record before the execution of said license.

SEC. 4. That all such grants, licenses, and conveyances, and all powers of attorney and agreements made under any letters-patent shall be acknowledged before an officer competent to take acknowledgments of deeds in the place where executed, and shall take effect from the time of filing the same for record in the Patent Office as to any subsequent purchaser, licensee, or mortgagee, for valuable consideration, without notice, and shall be void as to all such purchasers, licensees, and mortgagees, without notice, until filed for record as aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That any person who may wish to perpetuate testimony showing, or tending to show, that any applicant or patentee was not the first and original inventor of the thing patented by him, or of any substantial and material part thereof, claimed as new, may do so, subject to the following rules and conditions: He may file a bill or petition in the circuit court of any district in which the parties having the right to sue for infringement of said patent, or of any of them, reside or may be found, setting forth the date and subject of the patent, and the name of the patentee, the names and residences of the several parties interested in said patent so far as known to him, the names of witnesses proposed to be examined, and his desire to perpetuate testimony, as aforesaid. On the defendant being brought into court in the usual way, the court may enter an order or orders in the case, directing when and where the evidence shall be taken. Both parties may attend at the time and place, or times and places, so designated by the court, or at such times and places as they may agree, and then and there introduce such legal testimony as they may see fit, bearing on the question aforesaid; which evidence, when so taken, shall be filed among the records of the court; and the same, or duly-certified copies thereof, shall thereafter be received in all suits on said patent to which the said plaintiffs or petitioners, or any of them, and any of the defendants, or those claiming by, through, or under them, shall be parties. And the complainant or petitioner in any such proceeding shall, within thirty days after the filing in the court of any such testimony, file in the Patent Office a certificate of the clerk of the court setting forth when and where such testimony was taken and the names of the witnesses examined, which certificate shall be entered of record by the Commissioner of Patents in the assignment-records of the Patent Office. Any number of persons, whether jointly interested or not, may join in said petition; and, if necessary, several petitions may be filed, at the election of the petitioners, in different districts where any other parties interested in said patent resides or may be found. Each party to said petition shall pay the costs of taking its own testimony, but all the costs of court shall be paid by the petitioners; but the court may, in its discretion, assess upon the complainant or petitioner any part or all of the legal costs.

SEC. 6. That the four hundred and ninety-third section of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"The price to be paid for uncertified printed copies of specifications and drawings of patents shall be determined by the Commissioner of Patents, within the limits of fifty per cent. in excess of the cost of printing the same."

Mr. LYNDE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask the House to concur in the amendments made by the committee, and then to ask that the bill, as amended, be put upon its passage.

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LYNDE. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. I understand that the bill applies to actions now pending as well as to actions hereafter to be begun. Am I right?

Mr. LYNDE. It applies to all actions.

Mr. OLIVER. It seems to me a dangerous and unusual thing to amend the law so as to change the rule of damages on actions now pending in court. I desired to know what was the provision of the bill in regard to that.

Mr. LYNDE. It applies to all actions; and I think no injustice is done by the bill in that respect. There is certainly no injustice in applying the provisions of the bill to existing actions, if it is proper to apply them to actions which may be brought hereafter, for the reason that even in existing actions plaintiffs would only be allowed to recover damages for one year previous to the commencement of the suit, no notice of infringement having been given.

Mr. OLIVER. Perhaps there might have been no infringement within the year.

Mr. LYNDE. If there was no infringement within the year, then no damages would be recovered.

Mr. COCHRANE. I am opposed to the first section of this bill because it allows the recovery only of such damages for infringement as shall have occurred for and during the term of one year immediately preceding the notice of infringement. I do not understand why a patentee should not have the right to recover any damages he may have sustained by an infringement of his patent, and that without regard to the fact of notice or the time when he shall have discovered that infringement. I am opposed to any limitation in the bill which will, where it is clear there has been an infringement of the patent, restrict the right of the patentee to recover damages for that infringement.

Mr. LYNDE. From my observation in patent suits, I think that the patent law at the present time works more injustice than it does benefit to the American people. But whether that is true or not, it is certain that the law is made use of at the present time by patentees and patent lawyers for the purpose of breaking up or oppressing, or extorting large sums of money from the manufacturing and industrial interests of our country. And this law is reported merely for the purpose of protecting the community against those abuses.

I believe, for one, Mr. Speaker, that if a person has a patent from the United States Government he ought not to be liable in damages to any previous patentee who may bring suit against him for infringement, because it is the duty of the Government to examine every application that is made for a patent in the Patent Office. They have scientific experts there whose duty it is to determine as to every patent applied for, whether it infringes on any previous patent or not; and when it is found that that is not done, the patent is then issued. The patentee, then, goes forth to the country with his patent to mechanics and manufacturers, and the people believe that he has the right, as inventor of that patent, and that they have a right to use the machine. But here comes a prior patentee claiming it is an infringement of his patent. The case comes on in court; experts are called, and men who follow the business of testifying as a profession—hired experts, who receive large fees for giving testimony in patent cases—come forward and swear that the subsequent patent is an infringement upon the prior patent, and the manufacturing establishment is necessarily closed. It is to remedy this evil that this bill is presented and its passage recommended.

Mr. COCHRANE. That certain abuses have grown up in the application of the patent laws there can be no question; and I quite agree with my friend who has just taken his seat that it is very unfortunate in many cases that parties should be put to expense and trouble in defending unjust suits which may be brought against them for alleged infringements of patents, where in point of fact there has been no infringement. But that is not the question to which I spoke. The gentleman from Wisconsin has not replied to the suggestions which I made.

The letters-patent which are granted to an inventor guarantee to him the right of property in the thing which he has invented. He has the same right of property in his invention as he has in the horse which he owns, or in the farm which he owns; and any one who infringes that patent, any one who violates that right of property, should be held amenable for that violation. And I am opposed to any bill which provides that although a party may be able to show in a court of justice that he has sustained damages from the infringement of a patent to the extent, say, of $10,000, yet that because, forsooth, he can only show that he has sustained within a year damages to the extent of $1,000, a jury is to be precluded from allowing him the $9,000 damages which he sustained prior to that year, and that he is compelled to take only the $1,000, the amount of damages which he sustained within the year.

Mr. LYNDE. I move the previous question.

Mr. SAMPSON. I ask the gentleman to allow me to have a few moments before he demands the previous question.

Mr. LYNDE. Certainly; how much time do you want?

Mr. SAMPSON. Not more than five minutes.

Mr. LYNDE. I will yield to the gentleman for that time.

Mr. SAMPSON. I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that there would be a bill of this kind reported from the Judiciary Committee this morning, or I should have given it some attention. The theory of our laws is that we will protect the property of patentees; that property of this character is entitled to protection the same as any other. This bill proposes that no person shall be protected in his rights of property in a patent, except to secure damages for one year's use, unless he can give actual notice to the parties infringing that they are trespassing upon his rights; that is, if a party sees proper to infringe upon an invention and use it in secret, and the patentee is not able to discover its use for a year after the same has terminated, he can secure no damages therefor. Now we have an extensive country. Here are forty-four millions of people using this class of property, and on a great many occasions, in a great many instances, this property is used in secret for the purpose of preventing discovery. Parties may use a patent for a year or two in secret, and then for the first time, and more than one year after its last use, it comes to the knowledge of the owner of the patent-right that his patent has been infringed, and under this bill he can recover nothing for such wrongful use.

If we propose to protect this kind of property at all, it seems to me that we ought not to pass this bill. A great many innocent parties are interested in patent-rights. It is not always the patentee who is injured by infringement, but there are a great many assignees and thousands and thousands of persons become interested in patent property. Assignments are made, and made to parties who are not acquainted with the patent laws. I know of many farmers in our country who have honestly and innocently purchased interests in patent-rights, and they are trying to dispose of them in an honest way.

Now, sir, while they are thus endeavoring to sell their rights other parties are infringing on the patent in different parts of the country without their knowledge, and if a year passes before they discover such use, they have no right of action under this bill and no protection whatever for their property.

This it seems to me is against the entire policy of our patent laws. We say that a man shall have the right of action in case his patent is infringed, and then we say that if any man steals an invention and uses it secretly the patentee shall not have the right of action unless he discovers the theft within one year.

Mr. LYNDE. I believe the gentleman's five minutes have expired, and, as there are but five minutes left before the morning hour will expire, I must ask the previous question.

Mr. EAMES. Will not the gentleman allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. LYNDE. I must insist upon the previous question.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make a remark. I think I ought to have a right to say a word, as I am connected with the Committee on Patents.

Mr. LYNDE. I am compelled to insist upon the previous question.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Then I hope the House will vote it down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the previous question, and the Chair has no alternative but to put the question.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 71, noes 53.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for tellers, as no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LYNDE and Mr. EAMES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for the regular order, as I believe the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that the morning hour has expired.

Mr. COCHRANE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. LORD. I move that the House resume the consideration of the Geneva award bill.

At this point Mr. SAYLER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

SILVER COIN.

Mr. COX. I ask my colleague to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. LORD. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I thank my colleague for yielding to me to enable me to ask the House to finish up some matters from the Committee on Banking and Currency which have been placed in my charge, and as we are authorized to report at any time I ask to report back from that committee unanimously what is known as the Payne silver bill. The House has thoroughly discussed it, and upon a motion to suspend the rules has given it a majority. I do not propose now to discuss it, because it has had full discussion.

I bring it up at this time simply because I am informed by the Treasurer of the United States and other officers connected with the fiscal affairs of the Government that the passage of the bill is imperatively demanded, not only in the interest of this city and the commercial centers, but for the purpose of re-issuing the coin already in the Treasury. The committee reports a substitute for the bill introduced by Mr. FROST, of Massachusetts. I ask that it be put upon its passage, and on that I call the previous question.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I object, if it is not in order.

Mr. COX. The committee has a right to report at any time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee has a right to report at any time under the amended rule.

Mr. COX. I report from the Committee on Banking and Currency a substitute for House joint resolution No. 109, for the issue of silver coin.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin now in the Treasury to an amount not exceeding $40,000,000, in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes; and the notes so received in exchange shall be kept as a special fund, separate and apart from all other money in the Treasury, and be re-issued only upon the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency received at the Treasury in payment of dues to the United States; and said fractional currency, when so substituted, shall be destroyed and held as part of the sinking fund, as provided in the act approved April 17, 1876.

Mr. COX. I will state to the House that no one can take exception to this joint resolution on the ground that it is a surprise, for it is printed in the RECORD of this morning as a substitute for Mr. FROST'S joint resolution. It has been read several times, and the House has voted on it once or twice already. It is important to have it disposed of in some way or other at once, for if it goes over this week it may go over for ten days or two weeks before it can be reached.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to permit me to offer an amendment to the substitute he has reported.

Mr. COX. I am not instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to accept any amendment, but to press the consideration of the substitute at this time.

Mr. MILLS. Will you allow the amendment to be read?

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was to add to the substitute the following:

And that the third section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved the 14th day of January, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. COX. I am not authorized to admit any amendment.

Mr. MILLS. Then I hope the call for the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. COX. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, a statement of the amount of silver coin issued to June 7, 1876.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, June 7, 1876.

Silver issued to date, as per reports:
For redemption of fractional currency	$5,144,735
For payment of currency obligations	3,352,434
Total	8,497,169
On hand with assistant treasurers, &c	5,011,194
Ordered from United States mints to assistant treasurers and depositaries	2,230,000

Mr. COX. I am informed in an unofficial way that the demand for change is very great and some relief is imperatively demanded by the banks, the people, the manufacturing interests, and others, for it is impossible now to obtain change, either in silver coin or fractional currency, sufficient to meet the pay-rolls of the various establishments. Every member of Congress must have received letters on this subject. I do not propose to detain the House with any discussion, but will call the previous question, and if the House chooses to vote it down it can do so.

Mr. KASSON. One word, so that gentlemen may not vote on the previous question under a misapprehension.

Mr. COX. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to state that if the previous question shall not be sustained, the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will not be in order, because it is not germane to this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is a question for the Chair to decide. I hope that the previous question may be voted down, in order that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] may have an opportunity to offer his amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Before the gentleman calls the previous question I desire to state that the House some time ago, in a spirit of fairness and justness, gave authority to the Committee on Banking and Currency to report at any time on the subject of the currency, including of course the question of resumption. There is no propriety in mingling the two subjects of subsidiary coin and the resumption of specie payments. The other day, by a report from the Committee on Rules, I gave an opportunity to the Committee on Banking and Currency to report at any time upon the question of resumption of specie payment.

Mr. MILLS. Both of the propositions involve resumption; one to the extent of $10,000,000 and the other to the extent of the whole issue of legal-tender notes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I object to debate unless it can be general.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that I do not consider it either fair or just that this question of subsidiary silver coinage should be entangled with the question of resumption of specie payments.

Mr. SPRINGER. The House amended its rule especially to enable the Committee on Banking and Currency to report so that we could have a vote on the question of the repeal of the resumption act.

Mr. COX. I now call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER.) The Chair must beg the House to be in order. No business will be transacted until gentlemen cease conversation and resume their seats.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the call for the previous question for one minute, that I may say that several weeks since the Committee on Banking and Currency took action in regard to the matter of silver coinage, and it was brought before the House on a motion to suspend the rules. They have not had a meeting since that time so as to be able to dispose of the question of repealing the resumption act. Mr. PAYNE, of Ohio, one of the members of the committee is absent, and Mr. GIBSON, of Louisiana, is absent in New Orleans. As soon as there can be a meeting of the full committee, that moment the repeal of the resumption act will be considered. The silver bill is a matter requiring immediate action, and, as we think, a measure of immediate relief that is imperatively required. It has no connection parliamentarily or otherwise with the repeal of the resumption act.

I now call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; there being upon a division—ayes 85, noes 54.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now upon ordering the main question.

Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. LANDERS of Indiana, Mr. SPRINGER and others called for the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being upon a division ayes 28, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 86, not voting 98; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Beebe, Bell, Blaine, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, Candler, Cannon, Caswell, Caulfield, Chapin, Cochrane, Cox, Crapo, Crounse, Cutler, Danford, Denison, Dunnell, Durand, Durham, Eames, Foster, Frost, Garfield, Gause, Goode, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Harris, Hartridge, Haymond, Hendee, Henderson, Hurd, Hurlbut, Jenks, Joyce, Kasson, Kehr, Kimball, George M. Landers, Lane, Lapham, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Levy, Lord, Luttrell, Lynch, Lynde, Magoon, Maish, McCrary, McDill, Meade, Miller, Monroe, Morrison, Norton, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Piper, Potter, Rainey, Randall, John Robbins, Sampson, Schleicher, Sinnickson, A. Herr Smith, Strait, Stenger, Tarbox, Thompson, Throckmorton, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, John W. Wallace, Ward, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, Willard, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, James Wilson, and Woodworth—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, John H. Baker, Banning, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cason, Cate, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Collins, Cook, Culberson, Davis, De Bolt, Dibrell, Eden, Ellis, Evans, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Glover, Andrew H. Hamilton, John T. Harris, Hartzell, Hatcher, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hooker, Hunter, Hunton, Thomas L. Jones, Franklin Landers, Lawrence, Lewis, McFarland, McMahon, Milliken, Mills, Morgan, Nash, Neal, Oliver, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Poppleton, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, Rice, Riddle, Robinson, Savage, Sayler, Scales, William E. Smith, Southard, Sparks, Spencer, Springer, Terry, Tucker, Turney, Robert B. Vance, Walsh, Whitthorne, Fernando Wood, Yeates, and Young—86.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Atkins, Bass, Bliss, Burleigh, Chittenden, Conger, Cowan, Darrall, Davy, Dobbins, Douglas, Egbert, Ely, Faulkner, Fort, Freeman, Frye, Fuller, Gibson, Goodin, Gunter, Hale, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Hays, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoge, Hopkins, Hoskins, House, Hubbell, Hyman, Frank Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, King, Knott, Lamar, Edmund W. M. Mackey, L. A. Mackey, MacDougall, Metcalfe, Money, Mutchler, New, O'Brien, Odell, Parsons, Payne, Phelps, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Powell, Pratt, Purman, James B. Reilly, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Rusk, Schumaker, Seelye, Sheakley, Singleton, Slemons, Smalls, Stevenson, Stone, Stowell, Swann, Teese, Thomas, Thornburgh, John L. Vance, Waddell, Wait, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, Walling, Warren, Wheeler, White, Whiting, Andrew Williams, Alpheus S. Williams, James D. Williams, William B. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodburn—98.

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BANNING. My colleague, Mr. WALLING, is unavoidably absent. If here, he would vote "no."

Mr. STENGER. My colleague, Mr. HOPKINS, has been called home on important business.

Mr. GOODE. My colleague, Mr. DOUGLAS, is detained from his seat to-day by sickness.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia. On this question, I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. HOSKINS. If he were present, he would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. DURAND. My colleague, Mr. CONGER, is absent by order of the House. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. SEELYE, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLEY, are paired on this question.

Mr. WILLARD. My colleagues, Mr. HUBBELL and Mr. WALDRON, are absent by leave of the House. If here they would vote "ay."

Mr. CASWELL. My colleague, Mr. RUSK, who is absent by leave of the House, desired me to say that upon this bill he would if present vote "ay."

Mr. BRADLEY. I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. POPPLETON. My colleague, Mr. COWAN, is absent by leave of the House.

The result of the vote was announced as before stated.

The question then recurring on agreeing to the substitute, it was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the joint resolution,

Mr. ANDERSON called for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 28, noes 93.

Mr. ANDERSON called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF COIN.

Mr. COX. I am also directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, the bill known as the Randall bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Do not call it that.

Mr. COX. It is known as a very respectable bill. It is House bill No. 3398, for the issue of coin and other purposes.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Will the gentlemen allow me to have read an amendment which I wish to offer to this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be first read.

The substitute reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That, in addition to the amount of subsidiary coin authorized by law to be issued in redemption of the fractional currency, it shall be lawful to manufacture at the several mints, and issue through the Treasury and its several offices, such coin to the amount of $20,000,000.

SEC. 2. That the silver bullion required for this purpose shall be purchased from time to time, at market rate, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the resulting coin may be issued in the ordinary disbursement of the Treasury or in exchange for legal-tender notes at par; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue or exchange as herein provided without loss to the Treasury, and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $1,000,000.

SEC. 3. That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit, from time to time, the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same.

Mr. COX. I demand the previous question.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to strike out two or three words?

Mr. COX. I am authorized by the Committee on Banking and Currency to allow my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] to move an amendment striking out "$20,000,000" and inserting "$10,000,000."

By leave and favor of the House I am permitted to make a few remarks touching this silver legislation.

Before entering upon the brief discussion, may I be allowed to say that these matters have long since been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency? They were considered and ordered to be reported long before the House gave that committee the privilege to report at any time. Premising that the committee did not crave such an honored privilege, and that they have no wish to abuse it, I may say that they have instructed me to use the courtesy of the House only for urgent purposes.

The bill which has already passed was one that seemed too urgent to be disregarded any longer. The demand for "change" was imperative and popular. As I have already shown, the daily and hourly interests of trade and business required that bill as a sluice to allow the free issuance of the silver coins already authorized this session. I have shown authentically what amount has been placed in circulation and what amount remains retarded by the slow processes provided. The bill just passed was an indispensability. It was not intended to be a contraction or inflation measure. The argument for it is one entirely temporary. It is the ab convenienie. It cannot be disregarded.

The bill now before us has a like approval by the guardians of the Mint and Treasury. It has been well considered by the committee. The bill (No. 3647) now under consideration would continue the supply of silver coin for change, until the demand is filled. Those who are conversant with this branch of our public service do not think twenty millions too large. There is some export demand for this subsidiary silver. At present prices of silver bullion it can be coined at a profit of from 6 to 7 per cent. About fifty millions will be required (and I say this authoritatively) for purposes of change in the country. It will take the place of fractional currency; and it is very clear that, unless these bills or some additional coinage bills are passed, more fractional currency will have to be printed. That would be a step backward in the way of resumption. The people will not retrograde.

The Treasury has issued about $8,500,000 and they have about seven and a quarter yet on hand. These two bills will make no excess, and I sincerely hope both will pass at once and together.

Mr. Speaker, I trust it will not be considered either indelicate on my part or embarrassing to any other committee that I should report these bills from the Banking and Currency Committee. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who is not now present, in the most complimentary and respectful way intimated that the present Speaker pro tempore should be chary of indulging in the active business of legislation on the floor. I agreed with him; but it is within his exception that I am instructed to finish the business delegated to me before the honorable Speaker, [Mr. KERR,] now so lamentably stricken with illness, intrusted to me the engrossing duties as temporary chairman. I perform these trusts best by pursuing my line of duty on which lie these bills as to silver coin, long since passed upon by the committee of which I am chairman.

It was urged recently in debate by the distinguished champion of the greenback currency [Mr. KELLEY] that the Committee on Banking and Currency should not have the right to report at any time, because so long a time has elapsed without report from that committee on these all-important questions.

I have obtained leave to present these remarks, to state, in justification of the seeming inaction of our committee, that we were not the sole custodians and interpreters as committee-men of the difficult fiscal questions which now press upon this Congress and the country. In justification of that committee it will not be forgotten that in the early days of the session, (January 6,) not long after the committees were announced, and when the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] moved the appropriate reference of the subjects embraced in the President's annual message, a debate arose as to the appropriate reference of financial subjects. There was a seeming conflict between the Ways and Means and the Banking and Currency Committees. On the former committee were the honorable gentlemen [Mr. KELLEY and Mr. WOOD] who took part in that debate. On the Banking and Currency Committee were the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] and myself. The gentleman from New York quoted from remarks of mine when introducing, in 1865, the rule dividing up the old Ways and Means into three parts. The question arose as to which committee the currency problem should be relegated. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] stoutly championed our committee. I was disposed to allow both committees to tender their united wisdom and experience to solve the question; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] had no doubtful voice. He urged the Ways and Means, as did my colleague, [Mr. WOOD,] as the proper and only organ for initiating and reporting remedial legislation on currency. Here is what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said:

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has just said, I would like to call his attention and that of the House to the fact that the distinction made in the successive distribution of the President's message is a philosophic one. They refer all questions relating to the greenback to the Committee of Ways and Means. As was suggested by the other gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] the greenback is a part of the national debt. But it is more than that, sir. It is money. It is the current money of the realm. It is the legal tender with which all private debts and almost all public debts may be paid. It is the substance of which currency is the shadow. Checks, drafts, bills of exchange, bank-notes are liquidated in money, and therefore that which is at once part of the debt of the country and the legal-tender money of the country has always been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. * * *

The conclusion of this matter, Mr. Speaker, at that time, was a submission of such questions by my acquiescence to the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] thus emphasized this submission:

Mr. KASSON. I ask permission of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to say a single word. It is this: That if this resolution is adopted, as I presume it will be, (and I do not oppose it,) I desire it may be distinctly understood by the House and the country that original legislation touching the payment or redemption of the notes known as legal-tender or greenback will be with the Committee of Ways and Means, and not with the Committee on Banking and Currency. I distinctly wish to have that understood—for one at least, and for others around me here—that the question will be with that committee.

I submit, therefore, that if any committee is to be reprehended for lack of activity in this matter it is not the Committee on Banking and Currency. Or, to be more logical, it does not lie with the Ways and Means to derogate from us because of any dilatoriness. They are to say it mildly, equally charged and equally responsible for any non-action.

The simple truth is, that it is a problem where no hurried agreement was possible. No report from any committee, or from any party, would have received general acquiescence.

At last it seems to have been regarded that the Banking and Currency Committee possessed the most patience and studiousness in dealing with the problem; and it is a matter of regret that in its deliberations we had no Moses like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to guide us through the wilderness to the promised land!

Mr. Speaker, having thus vindicated our committee for its seeming slowness, let me commend it for its wisdom. It has done nothing to disturb the business interests of the country. The House has already approved of one of its bills on this silver question. Because we have been as yet unable to frame a substitute or make acceptable conditions upon the repeal of the futile resumption act, it does not follow that when a full committee appears to consider and report, that we will not obey the precept of the House in giving us leave to report at any time and present something upon that topic for legislative action.

As to the bill now before the House, which bears the paternity of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] some remarks may be added by leave of the House in explanation of its provisions.

The first section of this bill adds to the subsidiary coin already authorized, and which has been issued, all too slowly, to take up the fractional currency, twenty millions. Under this bill our mints may make and the Treasury issue this amount.

To effectuate this minting and issuance the Secretary of the Treasury may buy, from time to time, at market rates, with any money in the Treasury, the silver bullion. It allows no increase of the bonded debt. That objection is obviated. The coin is to issue as in ordinary disbursements, or on exchange for legal-tender notes at par. Hence it takes up what it gives out; and no valid objection going to the volume of the currency is tenable as valid to the bill. It will be noticed that the bill forbids any loss to the Treasury either in the coinage or issue; the cost of purchase at the market rates must cover such expense. The gain or seigniorage is to go into the Treasury under the existing laws. But the committee, by an amendment to the original bill, prudently provide that the amount invested in bullion at any one time—excluding the resulting coin—shall not exceed a million of dollars. The wisdom of that proviso is in its caution.

We do not know what the condition of the Treasury may be; nor do we delegate to the Treasury the whole discretion as to the purchase of bullion to any great extent.

It is known that the act of January 14, 1875, to resume specie payment contemplated this issue of silver coins, equal in number and amount to the fractional currency of similar denominations. Besides it gave to the Secretary of the Treasury discretion to issue the coins, as we provide in this bill in the ordinary disbursements of the Treasury, as through the mints, subtreasuries, post-offices, and public depositories. This act was simply re-enforced by our legislation of this session. It is a policy we do not propose to repeal in connection with the resumption act.

When this bill was first presented it had in it a provision for twenty-five millions. We have reduced that amount to twenty millions; and one of the Banking and Currency Committee, [Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania,] will present a further amendment limiting the amount to ten millions. He will give his reasons, and they are entitled to the consideration which experience and judgment bestow on that just gentleman.

That twenty millions is not too much, is testified to by the Treasurer of the United States, and will appear by the facts which I state. The coinage statistics show that there was under the act of 1853 forty-eight millions of silver change out.

It may be objected that the money of the Treasury will have to be used to provide this additional coin. But has it not already been shown that in the long run it is cheaper to issue the silver, which runs forty or fifty years and costs to make it about as much as to make the fractional currency per annum? The economies favor the issue of silver.

Besides, is silver disregarded as the legal-tender of the Constitution? If the organic law is unchanged, is it questionable whether the silver of legal standard can be limited as to amount when used as a legal-tender? But I do not propose to argue that.

We have a coin, legalized, of peculiar quality and for a peculiar purpose. In the last section of this bill we propose to discourage the trade-dollar. It answers no wise purpose, except for export. There is a reason why our bill should take away from that trade-dollar its legal-tender quality. It is not our standard. Its uses at home are not now as valuable as they were. But for export its demand may continue, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, from time to time, to coin such trade-dollars, so as to fill the export demand. By this, all know, is meant the demand in our Japanese and Chinese trade.

Its gold value is ninety or ninety-one cents. It is a legal tender for its face-value at one hundred cents, to pay a debt of $5 of gold on the Pacific coast.

The difference between the bullion value of silver and the nominal or tale value is, say, 8 per cent., and this is realized by depositors instead of the Government. The Federal depositories, under present laws, cannot refuse to receive trade-dollars. This trade-dollar interferes with the Government business of coining small silver, and has become redundant on the Pacific coast. There are two millions of it in circulation, and the chief harm of its redundancy and existence is inflicted upon the retail dealers.

In this connection I will read a letter from the Director of the Mint, of June 8, 1876. It is confirmatory of the committee's conclusion and its recommendation as to the trade-dollar will assist us in our votes:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Office of the Director of the Mint, June 8, 1876.

SIR: I received at two p. m. your note of yesterday inclosing bill H. R. No. 3198 for the issue of coin and other purposes, and requesting my opinion thereon, and especially in relation to the trade-dollar clause.

The general provisions of the bill appear to provide for the most convenient mode of issuing silver coin additional to that which is to be exchanged for fractional currency.

The section relating to the trade-dollar is necessary if its coinage on private account is to be continued, and principally for the reason that under existing laws and the reduced value of silver bullion, a seigniorage or gain arises in its coinage which is realized by the depositor instead of accruing to the Government.

The section, if passed as it now stands, will prevent any person from being compelled to receive this coin at its nominal value, and the provision placing its coinage under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury will enable that officer to restrict the amount of coinage to the actual requirements of the export trade.

In this connection I take the liberty of suggesting that it would be better to coin the trade-dollar exclusively on Government account in the mode proposed, and with the powers and functions which a bill now pending in the Senate confers upon a new dollar of the weight of 412.8 grains of standard silver, instead of issuing two silver dollars so near alike in value.

Very respectfully,

H. R. LINDERMAN, Director.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, allow me to call attention to a bill referred to our committee by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] yet to be considered. It may not be out of place to say that it has been favorably regarded.

It is a bill providing for the issue of subsidiary silver coin, and it enacts that any owner of silver bullion may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, deposit the same at any coinage mint or the assay office New York, and receive payment therefor in subsidiary silver coins at a rate of price per standard ounce to be fixed and announced from time to time by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; such price to be based on the market rate. The cost of coinage shall devolve on the seller of the bullion, and the profit or seigniorage arising therefrom shall accrue to the Government; provided, that the total amount of silver coin issued under this act shall not exceed the sum of $25,000,000.

This may be reported favorably. Why? Saint Louis receives from Utah, Colorado, and the Mexicos ores in sacks and in rocks. She has manufactories for separation. Many millions are embarked in this enterprise and more millions are ready. It seems good sense to allow these ores to be separated by our native chemistry and enterprise instead of sending them to Wales. If this be done, why not allow the resulting bullion to be coined for private parties and the seigniorage retained by our Government?

But that is yet to be considered fully. If it be considered wise and expedient, the trouble, expense, and risk of coinage will be saved, and the coins go out. If private interests do not use this privilege, no harm can come from the passage of the bill. If the bill now before the House be a failure, then perhaps this bill yet to be considered may be a proper and useful substitute.

Another bill is pending before the Senate. It has a wider scope, and may find a more intelligent consideration than in this hasty legislation of to-day. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] looks toward such a policy. I may be pardoned for suggesting its features, and the reasons for it, as I learn them from the Director of the Mint.

The proposed dollar of 412.8 grains with silver at fifty-two pence corresponds very nearly in gold value with the paper dollar. (Gold at 112½.)

It is to be a legal-tender in sums not exceeding $20, and receivable without limit in payment of dues to the Treasury except duties on imports.

Under the provisions of the act for the resumption of specie payments the paper dollar may be expected to graduall, appreciate, and by January, 1879, be at par with gold.

It is not probable that silver will materially appreciate in value during the same period, and on the contrary, the indications are that it will still further depreciate. The paper dollar proposed by that Senate bill may therefore be expected to have a higher gold value than the proposed silver dollar, which, although a legal lender in sums not exceeding $20, cannot be expected to enter into circulation to any considerable extent, especially while the one and two dollar bills continue out. The principal demand for the new dollar will be for the payment of internal-revenue dues to the United States, for which it will be used in preference to legal-tenders as long as it can be procured at a lower rate than the latter. Assuming this as the probable result, the inquiry naturally arises as to the mode of the Treasury for getting rid of these dollars. If of less value than legal-tender notes, no one will accept them in exchange for the latter; and being a legal tender for only $20, they could not be paid out to any considerable extent in the ordinary disbursements of the Treasury. As these dollars may, however, pay any dues to the Government equally with legal-tender notes, they will, until the issue has been considerable, maintain a value nearly equal to the legal-tender notes; but whenever the issue shall be in excess of the demand for the purpose indicated, they will, provided silver shall not materially advance in value, depreciate and become a drug in the market. If this should prove to be the case, the United States Treasury would find it difficult to get rid of the amount which it would be obliged to receive in payment of dues.

One of the objects of issuing this dollar suggested by the Senate bill appears to be to re-establish the old relative proportion of silver to gold in the coinage, 16 to 1, but that would not amount to much, with a restriction of legal tender. In the present attitude of the principal European countries with respect to silver as a monetary standard and the undoubted large excess of supply over demand, may it not be unwise to attempt to establish a double standard on a basis which would value silver say 12 per cent. above its commercial relation to gold? Let this be weighed by thoughtful legislators.

If it were admitted that the true policy of this country is to establish a double standard, the time has not arrived even to consider what the ratio of the two metals should be. We should first see what decision shall be arrived at by France, Belgium, and Holland. Unless those countries adhere to the double standard, its establishment by the United States would, in the present condition of affairs, practically be the adoption of the silver standard, and open a market for the surplus of the world, and without any reasonable prospect of arresting the decline in the value of silver.

Instead of issuing a dollar of 412.8 grains, it would no doubt be far better to coin the trade-dollar exclusively on Government account and give it precisely the same character and uses which the pending bill provides for the proposed new dollar. This would make the trade-dollar an active and useful domestic coin, and would not lessen its value for export to the oriental nations.

The coinage might be large, but there would be no danger of redundancy.

The export of ten or twelve millions to China annually would effectually prevent that. With this export value no serious embarrassment could arise in case silver should fall considerably lower, but it would not be so with the proposed new dollar, as it would have no export value except as bullion.

The value of the trade-dollar is one and one-half cents more than the proposed dollar of 412.8 grains, and having an export demand equal to about one million per month. Greenbacks would be readily given in exchange for it, and if used to pay internal duties the Treasury would find a ready market for it.

It is quite certain that the trade-dollar, if these suggestions be adopted, can be made a much more active and useful coin than the proposed new dollar, and that the effect would be to more surely and rapidly appreciate the value of greenbacks; and it would be much more likely to preserve a purchasing power equal to greenbacks, and with gold, after resumption, than a dollar of 412.8 grains.

I present these propositions not so much by way of unreserved approval as to provoke careful reflection.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, allow me to thank the House for their leave to present these facts and principles bearing upon our silver issues.

In presenting this bill and explaining possible and future bills, we take one more steady step forward to reach the legal tender of the Constitution, to obtain a currency which is worth what it costs to get it out of the earth.

If we utilize the labors of our mines by recurring to the universal standard from which silver cannot be eliminated, there will be, in more ways than one, a spur to production, a revival of trade, and increased demands for labor. When, as in our country at present, labor is depressed and the productive classes unemployed, it becomes us to approach as nearly as possible a rigid standard. The increase or diminution in the measure of value so as to disturb that standard is injustice to all. Legislation may not avail to protect against such injustice, but certainly it is our duty to avoid all artificial stimulants or narcotics in the political body. Nature, as well as commerce and trade, if left unshackled, will work out the fiscal problems of our time and country far better than hasty, selfish, or sectional legislation.

Why, then, should we discriminate in our legislation against silver, a product of our own land? It is a product, like wheat. It costs to get it. Its beauty and brilliancy are inferior to no metal. Softer than copper, harder than gold, its malleability makes it a medium, and our organic law regards it as a legal medium of exchange. Its very ductility gives it a quality as wonderful as that of any metal. It may be drawn out into wires finer than hair. A grain of it may be extended by the genius of mechanism four hundred feet in length. Its tenacity is not less remarkable. Its alloy with copper by fusion not only makes it harder, but gives it a ringing sonorousness which is beginning to make music in the pockets of the million. It may be too heavy for lazy effeminacy, but it is none the less precious when jingled in the hand of toil. Our Government has fixed its standard, as have Britain, Austria, and France. Let us maintain it, as our fathers advanced it, above and out of the slough of the continental currency!

This white metal is not a new coin. I have seen its old mines in Cartagena, which were once worked by Spanish slaves under Roman masters, as Peru and Mexico have worked their mines under Spanish mastery. The ancients used silver for coin, and made the coin unalloyed. Hungary, Saxony, Norway, and Asiatic Russia have had and yet have their mines of silver; but all nations, ancient and modern, fail in its production in comparison with our own mining miracles. The stories of Monte Cristo and the fables of Aladdin and the Orient do not touch the realities of Nevada with its incalculable bonanzas.

In our present emergencies, and when the bulk of the currency of our country is provincial paper; when it is, therefore, non-exportable; when it is neither the standard of wages nor prices; when it is not the legal tender which industry deserves or the Constitution contemplates, is it not a heroic and wise movement toward honest money, to prepare with caution and receive with prudence this remarkable metal placed by Providence within the bosom of the earth, to be delved after as a factor in the exchanges of our enterprising country and busy world? Well might the Psalmist exclaim: "O, Lord, how manifold are Thy works! In wisdom hast Thou made them all. The earth is full of Thy riches."

Mr. EDEN. I rise to a point of order. This bill makes appropriations, and should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX. The point of order is made too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask to have my amendment read for information.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment being read.

Mr. TOWNSEND of Pennsylvania, Mr. REAGAN, and Mr. LANDERS of Indiana rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, yields to his colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] that he may offer an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the bill by striking out "$20,000,000" and inserting "$10,000,000."

I desire in a very few words to explain the reason wherefore I offer that amendment. The object of my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in introducing the bill was to supply a deficiency which he imagined existed in the fractional-currency system of the country arising from the destruction of the fractional notes. I think, sir, I can show that the amount is far beyond what is or will be the actual deficiency that will arise from the destruction of those notes.

I have a table from the Treasury showing that the whole amount of fractional currency outstanding of the first four issues down to the last issue, which was made last February, is only $18,000,000, while the gentleman's bill is to supply its place by an issue of subsidiary coin to the amount of $20,000,000. But that fractional currency is still coming in. It comes in every day. The day on which I was at the Treasury and obtained this statement, May 25 last, there had come in of it $324,000 for the purpose of being destroyed. No man can tell precisely within the next twenty years how much of it will be destroyed, for it will be coming in all the time, until the whole of it that can be obtained comes into the Treasury.

To arrive at any conclusions as to the amount that may be needed we have to arrive at those conclusions by analogy, by ascertaining what has been the destruction of other paper currency. And I find in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency that out of the $60,000,000 that were issued by the United States from July 17, 1861, to December 31, 1862, in fives, tens, and twenties, the whole amount outstanding on the 1st of November, 1875, was only $69,707, or one-ninth of 1 per cent.; while this bill proposes to supply a deficiency of 40 per cent. of fractional currency.

Mr. BUCKNER. I would ask the gentleman if he thinks there is any danger of our getting too much gold and silver in the country?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Not if it is of the right weight and standard.

Now in New York State, of two hundred and eighty-six banks, the maximum circulation was $50,754,515; and after six years' notice for all of those notes to come in, after which time they would not be payable or redeemable at the Treasury, there was left out only $1,336,009, equal to $2\frac{63}{100}$ per cent. of the whole amount. And again, thirty of those banks in the city of New York are still redeeming their circulation as a matter of honor, although exonerated from it by the law; and of their $7,763,000 circulation there is only now unredeemed $142,365, equal to about $1\frac{83}{100}$ per cent.

In Wisconsin, of two hundred and forty State banks, there are unredeemed only $1\frac{86}{100}$ per cent. And of all the national banks which failed in 1870 there is but $1\frac{39}{100}$ per cent. of the circulation outstanding.

Of the $50,000,000, then, of fractional currency which we have issued, the whole amount that we can reasonably expect that the Government will ever be advantaged by would be about 5 per cent., and not more than 10 per cent. at the utmost, which would be about $5,000,000. I am willing, however, to make any reasonable allowance and let the bill stand at $10,000,000, which would be to allow that 20 per cent. of the issue of the fractional currency would not be redeemed.

I am opposed to the issue of any more of this subsidiary coin, this depreciated currency, than may be absolutely necessary for the every-day wants of trade. The experience of the country shows that there never was necessary more than $41,000,000 of fractional currency. There never was outstanding in the hands of the people at any one time more than forty-one millions and two or three hundred thousand dollars of these fractional notes. It would be an erroneous policy, therefore, to issue more than was necessary for the wants of the people. If we take off $10,000,000, from the $41,000,000, it would leave $31,000,000. But the gentleman proposes in this bill to add to that $20,000,000, making the whole outstanding subsidiary coin and minor currency over $51,000,000, and inflating the currency to that extent with a kind of currency that will necessarily be depreciated, because it is an overplus.

Now it is the fact with regard to this very subsidiary coin that before the war and while it was in circulation, there being at that time about $50,000,000 thereof, it made a plethora in the subsidiary silver currency of the country, and it was with the greatest difficulty that men who had large amounts of it could get rid of it at par. Besides that, it is a tax and a burden on the laboring man, because the greater part of his purchases are made in this kind of coin at the grocers, the butchers, and the bakers, and the store-keepers generally; and knowing that they will have to pay their bills in this kind of coin to their creditors in the commercial cities, and that in doing so they have to submit to a discount, they always take care to protect themselves by putting an additional price upon all articles which the poor man has to buy.

For these reasons, therefore, that it will be beyond the wants of the people and a tax upon the laboring classes to adopt the bill in this present shape, I hope that my amendment, which will carry the amount of currency far enough, will be adopted by the House, and that the amount proposed by my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL,] being too much, will be voted down.

Mr. COX. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to have his amendment read.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like the gentleman to allow me five minutes on my amendment. I do think the House ought to hear me five minutes on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. REAGAN. This is not a question upon which to gag members.

Mr. COX. The gentleman says I would gag members on this question. Why, sir, I was about to yield to him the time he asks.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will do so.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Texas will withdraw the word "gag" I will.

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly. I read the amendment which I propose.

It is in line 4 of section 2, to strike out the words "or in exchange for legal-tender notes at par;" so that it will read:

SEC. 2. That the silver bullion required for this purpose shall be purchased from time to time, at market rate, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the resulting coin may be issued in the ordinary disbursement of the Treasury; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue or exchange as herein provided without loss to the Treasury, and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $1,000,000.

What I want to say is that in a time of contraction and depression like this it seems to me to be an unwise policy to take from the circulation of the country any amount of the legal-tender notes. We have just passed a bill, the effect of which is apparently to retire ten millions of Treasury notes in the interest of the banks and against the interests of the country. These words "or in exchange for legal-tender notes at par" are also, whatever the intention of the committee was, in the interest of the banks and against the interests of the people of the country, to the extent of proposing to retire Treasury notes to place it in the power of the banks by the issue of currency to take up twenty millions of coin.

If the gentleman will allow that amendment, I am anxious to see this bill pass, authorizing the issue of $20,000,000 in subsidiary coin to be disbursed by the Government in any payments which it may have to make, if you put this additional silver coin in circulation and keep it out of the power of the banks to subscribe for it, and retire from circulation $20,000,000 of the present circulating medium, which the business of the country requires. I am indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from New York, and will not trespass further on the time of the House.

Mr. COX. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] to have an amendment read only.

The amendment of Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "offices," in the sixth line, and insert as follows:

One hundred million dollars in silver coin as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the silver bullion required for this purpose shall be purchased at its market rates by the Secretary of the Treasury, with any legal-tender notes not otherwise appropriated, and the resulting coin may be issued in the ordinary disbursements of the Treasury; and no purchase of bullion in exchange for said legal-tender notes shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same will not admit of its coinage and issue without loss to the Government, and any gain or seigniorage arising from its coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as now provided by law relative to subsidiary coinage; and the coinage of the bullion shall be one-half in dollars of the same weight and fineness as the legal silver dollar of the United States in use January 1, 1861, and the remainder in fifty, twenty-five, and ten-cent pieces, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct. Said dollar shall be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, and the fractional part thereof shall be a legal tender for all debts not exceeding $20.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep a careful account of the amount of all silver coin issued under this act and the act authorizing the issue of subsidiary coin for the redemption of fractional currency, together with the amount and kind of coined silver exported or used for manufacturing purposes, and at all times to keep in circulation of subsidiary silver coin and fractional currency a sum of not less than $45,000,000; and said Secretary shall always, when requested, deliver in sums of $50, or any multiple thereof, fractional currency in exchange for legal-tender notes at their par value, which legal tender notes shall be covered into the Treasury with other public funds. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to prepare and keep on hand a sufficient amount of fractional currency to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to have an amendment read.

Mr. COX. I now yield for that purpose.

The amendment of Mr. BLAND was read, as follows:

That the silver dollar of 412.8 grains standard silver to the dollar is hereby authorized to be coined at the mints of the United States, and said dollar shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, not specified to be paid in gold.

Mr. COX. There is a bill pending in the Senate in reference to that matter, to which attention will be called. It is worthy of the careful attention of members. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to state with reference to this bill that it is to supply a deficiency in the amount of subsidiary coin. From the best estimate I can reach, the amount of subsidiary silver coin which will go out under the legislation known as the substitution legislation as silver in place of fractional currency will not exceed $25,000,000.

I introduced a bill which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, proposing a further issue of $25,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin. The committee reduced the amount from twenty-five millions to twenty millions and so reported the bill to the House.

Now this question of the amount of subsidiary coin necessary to do the business of the country is simply one regulated by past experience. Before the war, so far as I can find out from statistics, the amount of silver coin in use for small transactions, the retail transactions of the business of the country, was $48,000,000. Now, my judgment leads me to believe that with the increased population of the country $50,000,000 will not be too much, and that it will require at least $50,000,000. Some who are well informed on this subject declare that $65,000,000 could be very well floated and there would be no redundancy of that amount.

The next point in this plan is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase $1,000,000 of silver bullion with $1,000,000 of legal-tender notes or of national-bank notes, and the legal-tender notes paid for the bullion will go at once into circulation. There is, therefore, no feature in this bill which proposes in the least to contract the currency or to destroy any portion of the greenback circulation. The million of dollars of silver bullion having been purchased with the $1,000,000 of notes in the Treasury, the bullion is then minted, the Government secures the seigniorage, and that amount of coin is issued and goes into circulation.

Mr. REAGAN. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if these words, "or in exchange for legal-tender notes at par," do not take those legal-tender notes out of circulation?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; it only allows $1,000,000 to be used at any one time for the purchase of silver bullion for coin, and the result in coin when it is paid out makes the debit and credit sides of the Government account exactly even.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is talking about one clause of the bill and I about another. The clause I am referring to is this: "And the resulting coin"—that is, the coin made from the bullion purchased—"may be issued in the ordinary disbursement of the Treasury, or in exchange for legal-tender notes at par."

Mr. RANDALL. It is not my object to retire any of the legal-tender notes in any way by this bill. I do not know how that clause came in, and I am willing to have it struck out.

Mr. REAGAN. If that clause is struck out I will support the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. That is the clause making provision for putting into circulation the silver coin resulting from the bullion purchased.

Mr. RANDALL. The object is to put the silver coinage into circulation, not to destroy the greenbacks.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the gentleman any objection to an amendment providing for the retirement of an equivalent amount of paper circulation as this coin is issued?

Mr. RANDALL. I would object to that, because I do not want to trench upon that question at all. I may just as well say here that in my remarks upon the amendment to the rules the other day I desired to say that I believed the Committee on Banking and Currency would give, and I now say that under that expression of the House I think they are bound to give us an opportunity to vote for some act that may modify the resumption act. As I understand that act, I do not think it contains any provision to give it force and effect. The result is that we are fast approaching the day fixed for the act to go into effect without any preparation whatever for resumption.

Mr. KASSON. That question is not now before the House, and I must object to its being debated at present.

Mr. COX. I call the previous question.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for three minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. I want my amendment to be offered.

Mr. COX. I am willing to hear the amendment of my colleague [Mr. WHITEHOUSE] read for information only, and I will yield to him for three minutes to make some remarks.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to know if my amendment is pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood that it was agreed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that it should be read for information only.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] said that he had no objection to my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has not the charge of this bill; it is in the control of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who reported it from the committee.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the Committee on Banking and Currency undertake to forbid any amendments? I hope the House will not permit this bill to be forced through in this way.

Mr. COX. I yield to allow the amendment of my colleague to be read.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. WHITEHOUSE, as follows:

Amend the substitute by striking out $20,000,000 and inserting $15,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to permit the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to test the sense of the House upon his amendment.

Mr. COX. What is the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Texas desires the sense of the House to be taken on striking out these words: "Or in exchange for legal-tender notes at par."

Mr. REAGAN. That is all I ask.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the object of putting in that clause was to provide the means for putting into circulation the silver coin provided for in this bill.

Mr. KASSON. It is simply a privilege to people who want to make the exchange of notes for coin, and ought to be in the bill.

Mr. COX. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. WHITEHOUSE] for three minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. Is my amendment pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to allow the gentleman from Texas to offer his amendment?

Mr. COX. I yield first to my colleague [Mr. WHITEHOUSE] for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair will rule that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is not before the House.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, in proposing my amendment for reducing the amount of subsidiary coin, I have done so with a full conviction that it provides the full amount required for this purpose, and will be ample to meet the demands of the people.

I am in favor of an early resumption of specie payment, either in silver of proper standard value or in gold. I voted against the resumption act of 1875, not that I was opposed to the resumption of specie payments at as early a day as practicable, but I thought it unwise at that time to specify any particular time, especially in the absence of any legislation in that measure furnishing the requisites for resumption, and in the absence of any previous legislation tending in that direction.

I have steadily voted during this session against all propositions for the unqualified repeal of that resumption act, because I had hoped that the repeal would be accompanied by some measure which would have a tendency toward the resumption of specie payments, however slowly. But at this late day of the session I despair of having that repeal accompanied by anything looking toward the resumption of specie payments, and hence I must say that at this late hour I am prepared to vote for and shall most gladly support any bill for the repeal of that portion of the resumption act of 1875 which names a specified day for resumption.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Why not let us have a fair and square vote on the repeal of the resumption act? That is what we want.

Mr. COX. I yield for the purpose of allowing the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to be offered. That being admitted, I shall call the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the amendment which has been already read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. COX. I now call the previous question absolutely.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, to strike out $20,000,000 and insert $10,000,000, it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. REAGAN to strike out in section 2 the words "or in exchange for legal-tender notes at par."

Mr KASSON. That takes away the popular right to exchange.

The amendment was agreed to; there being ayes 64, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas a further amendment, to strike out after the words "coinage and issue" the words "or exchange," so as to make the proposition harmonious.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope that modification will be adopted.

Mr. COX. I trust there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that amendment will be made.

There being no objection, the modification was agreed to.

The substitute reported by the committee, as amended, was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency whether this bill proposes to retire any of the legal-tender notes now in circulation?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The bill was passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, obtained leave to have printed as part of the debates, remarks on the bill just passed. [See Appendix.]

ARMY OFFICERS ON DUTY AT WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX,) by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a statement of pay and allowances of officers on duty at Washington since March 4, 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRIBUTION OF GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. LORD. I move that the House resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2685) for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS proceeded to address the House.

CARE OF THE HALL.

While Mr. WILLIS was speaking some confusion occurred in the Hall, in consequence of some of the glass falling from one of the escutcheons in the ceiling.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the interruption of the business of the House, occasioned by the fall of a part of one of the panes of glass in the ceiling overhead, to ask attention to the necessity of some action that shall prevent its recurrence. There is some person over our heads evidently engaged in some employment that ought to be deferred until adjournment. The orders of the House forbid any person to pass over the ceiling during its sessions. This order has been violated and it has endangered, and will endanger, if allowed, the lives of members. It has occurred before. I move that the Clerk of the House be directed to inquire into the cause of this interruption to our proceedings and to report the facts to the House, with such recommendations as may prevent the recurrence of the accident.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX.) This is a question of the personal safety of members, and is one of the highest privilege. The Chair understands that the Hall is under the control of the Clerk, and that the Clerk has already sent a messenger to ascertain how this has occurred, and he will report to the House what it means.

Mr. BANKS. I think we want something more than that. This has occurred before, and may occur again. I ask for action on my motion that the Clerk be directed to inquire into the cause of this interruption of the proceedings of the House, and that he report the facts to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. We are not safe if people are going to break windows over our heads.

The motion of Mr. BANKS was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. WILLIS resumed the floor.

Mr. HURLBUT. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] will yield to me, I will move that the House do now adjourn. The gentleman can complete his remarks on Monday.

Mr. WILLIS. There is a gentleman on this floor who desires to participate in this debate, and purposes leaving the city to-night. I promised to yield a portion of my time to him, and it would be a violation of good faith if I yielded now to a motion to adjourn. The member to whom I refer is the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. WELLS.] But before yielding to him I desire to yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. POPPLETON,] who has a report to present from the Committee of Elections.

CONTESTED ELECTION—ABBOTT VS. FROST.

Mr. POPPLETON. I rise to make a report from the Committee of Elections in the case of Josiah G. Abbott vs. Rufus S. Frost. I ask that the resolutions be read, and move that the report be printed and lie on the table.

The resolutions reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Rufus S. Frost was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That Josiah G. Abbott was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts.

The report was ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, presented the views of a minority of the committee.

The minority report, concluding with the following resolutions, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That Rufus S. Frost was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in this House.

Resolved, That Josiah G. Abbott was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in this House.

TARIFF.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD, as part of the debates, some remarks which he had prepared in regard to the tariff bill. [See Appendix.]

BONDS AUTHORIZED BY ACT OF JUNE 20, 1874.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3589) to prevent default or delay in the payment of interest on the bonds authorized by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, ordered to be printed.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. WILLIS. I resume the floor and yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. WELLS.]

[The remarks of Mr. WILLIS will appear hereafter when completed.]

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I send to the desk to be read an amendment which I desire to have printed in connection with my remarks

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That an act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," approved June 23, 1874, and as amended by divers acts, namely—

First. By an act approved December 24, 1875, entitled "An act to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims;"

Second. By an act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress;" and Third. By an act approved March 6, 1876, entitled "An act to extend the time for claimants under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress to prove their claims"— be, and the same is hereby, continued and extended to the 22d day of July, 1877, with the same effect, and no other, as if said last-named day had been named in said act for the termination of the powers of said court, and said act is hereby continued in force during said period, subject, however, to the changes, alterations, and amendments hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 2. That in addition to the class of claims provided for in said act, it shall be the duty of said court to receive and examine two other several classes of cases, namely, claims directly resulting from damage caused by any and all of the so-called confederate cruisers or their tenders, and claims for the payment of premiums for war risks, whether paid to corporations, agents, or individuals, after the sailing of any confederate cruiser; and the said court shall not give priority to either, but shall give judgment in full in each and every case, no matter to which class belonging.

SEC. 3. That the said court shall report to the Secretary of State a list of the several judgments and decisions made by it, a certified copy of which shall, upon the conclusion of the business of the said court, be by him transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereafter as soon as may be, and upon such notice and such manner as he shall prescribe, pay the said judgments, together with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, or the amount of said judgments from the date certified, unto the persons respectively in whose favor the same shall have been made, or to their respective legal representatives, in full satisfaction and discharge of said judgments. After payment of the two classes before provided for, any sum that remains in the Treasury is hereby appropriated as follows:

First, said court shall ascertain what persons have sustained injuries to person or health by reason of such confederate cruisers, and, in any case in which it shall be satisfied that such personal injury has been sustained, may award therefor a reasonable sum.

Second, the residue shall be paid into the Treasury for future appropriation.

SEC. 4. That the said court of commissioners of Alabama claims shall be extended and shall continue to exist for one year, from and after the 22d day of July, 1876; and, should it be found impracticable to complete the work of said court before the expiration of the said one year, the President may, by proclamation, extend the time of the duration thereof to a period not more than six months beyond the expiration of the said one year; and in such case all the provisions of this act shall be taken and held to be the same as though the continuance of the said court had been originally fixed by this act at the limit to which it may be thus extended.

SEC. 5. That all laws and clauses of laws coming in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the indemnity paid over by Great Britain to the United States under the award of the Geneva arbitration was $15,500,000 in gold. This fund was invested in a 5 per cent. security in 1873. The fund now, principal and interest, when converted into currency, will amount to about $21,000,000.

According to the most reliable estimates, it will take about eight millions of the fund to pay all the judgments now rendered and to be rendered up to the 22d of July next, when the act under which the court is now organized will cease to be operative; leaving about thirteen millions of the fund. The history of our negotiations with Great Britain, beginning with the treaty of Washington and ending with the award at Geneva, proves beyond dispute that this remaining thirteen millions belongs to some portions or classes of our citizens. The award at Geneva was peculiar in its character. Although paid as a sum in gross, which was to cover all claims growing out of the depredations of confederate cruisers, yet it was arrived at, in some way never made public, upon special data based upon losses suffered by American citizens. As this sum was paid to re-imburse for these losses, it must be admitted that the Government of the United States should make distribution of this fund among those of her citzens who suffered wrong.

It is to be hoped there are but few who favor covering the remainder of this fund into the National Treasury. Such an act would be not only unjust and cruel to our own citizens, to whom the money rightfully belongs, but it would be an act of national discourtesy and national wrong to Great Britain. It would be a palpable breach of good faith toward that power. The Government of the United States affected the deepest anxiety to obtain this remuneration for her injured citizens. The claims of our citizens were presented at Geneva as the basis of our demand. Great Britain paid it as such, and for that purpose. If we now divert this money to the general uses of the nation, we shall occupy the position in the eyes of the world of having misled, deceived, and imposed upon Great Britain, and of having obtained millions of money from her under false pretenses. What would the friendly arbitrators of other countries, that made the award, think of our Government, if they see that we used them as mere cat's-paws, to cheat a friendly nation, for the purpose of replenishing our own Treasury, instead of paying it over to those who are entitled to the protection of the Government, and for whose benefit it was awarded?

If we can find none among our own people who are entitled to this money, then we should show ourselves to be a just and magnanimous nation, and tender it back to Great Britain again. We should prove ourselves to be too noble, too proud, too generous, too just, to defile our hands with money that belongs to others, and which we had managed to get hold of by indirection and fraudulent pretense. But I take it for granted this is not to be done. I hope we shall be spared seeing any names recorded in favor of appropriating to our own use money which does not belong to us.

The practical question is, how shall we dispose of this fund in conformity with our duty, and in discharge of the obligation which rests upon us? What class or classes of our citizens are best and most justly entitled to it? Without going into the argument of that question now, I will advert to the fact that there are three classes of our people who insist that it was their losses by the depredations of the confederate cruisers, and their claims for redress, that superinduced the treaty of Washington and the arbitration at Geneva, and who contend that they are entitled to priority in the distribution of this fund. It is much to be regretted that these several classes of claimants are indulging in a feeling of rivalry and in terms of disparagement toward each other.

The three classes of claimants who are contending for the balance of this fund, or a portion of it, are, first, the insurance companies; second, those who paid heavy war premiums during the war on vessels and cargoes, owing to the danger of capture by the confederate cruisers; and, third, those who lost by the depredations of the other exculpated cruisers of the Confederate States, the Nashville, the Sumter, the Georgia, Tallahassee, &c. Each of these classes of claimants is contending for priority, as being most meritorious. What ought Congress to do? Each class of claimants suffered loss; each contends that it has the strongest ground on which to apply to Congress for redress.

The award was made to the nation for actual sufferers. By the treaty of Washington all the claims growing out of the ravages of the confederate cruisers on the high seas were satisfied by the sum awarded.

As to the insurance companies, Congress may well pause, and listen to the objections urged by those who say that the insurance companies reaped a rich harvest from the heavy premiums they received upon war risks; they made money enough by the war; and they ought to be content with the law as it now stands, which provides for allowing them for the surplus of what they lost, over and above what profit they realized on war premiums paid them. We cannot ignore the history of the negotiation, and what was done at Geneva. The claims of the insurance companies were presented at Geneva in detail. These claims did constitute a part of the data on which the arbitrators at Geneva made their award in gross of fifteen and a half millions. The representatives of Great Britain at Geneva did not object to these claims of the insurance companies as evidence; so far from it, they readily admitted them, according to the commercial law of the world, as evidence. It cannot be claimed that the United States received, and now holds, a portion of this fund as a trustee for the insurance companies, and that in equity and in good faith it ought to be paid to them, for it must be borne in mind that the representatives of the United States at Geneva, under the treaty and special instructions from the Executive here at home, positively refused to bind our Government, or to commit it in any way, as to how, in what proportions, or to what parties, it would distribute this fund, reserving to itself entire control over that question. This our Government no doubt felt itself called upon to have stipulated, by way of maintaining its independence and unconditional authority in dealing with its own citizens. So that, while in equity and good faith the Government cannot absolve itself from the obligation to perform its duties for a certain class of our people, yet literally it reserved to itself the power and the right to remunerate any meritorious class of the population that suffered from the depredations of the confederate cruisers, if they should think proper to do so.

We have no reliable data by which to judge of the motives that actuated the parties at Geneva. Looking at the history of the transaction, it must be admitted that the claims for war premiums and for losses by the exculpated cruisers were presented at Geneva, and after long discussion were thrown out. But may it not be, is it not reasonable to suppose, that our Government may have regarded their agreement to the abandonment of these claims as the price they had to pay for the allowance of the claims that were recognized in making up the award in gross? If our Government presented the war-premium claims and the claims for losses by the exculpated cruisers as being equally meritorious with the claims of the insurance companies; if the abandonment of the latter was an element that entered into the allowance of the former; if the Government temporarily sacrified the latter as a part of the price paid for the former, is not the Government now bound, when it has the entire control over the whole subject, to remunerate one meritorious class of claimants as well as another? It reserved to itself the power to do so, subject to the equities of the parties interested.

Those who paid heavy war premiums were forced to do so as a consequence of a war the Government was then waging. They were compelled to pay these excessive premiums or abandon the pursuits of commerce. It was the only method by which our ships could be kept afloat. And now, while paying for the losses of ships and cargoes that they thus enabled to fly the American flag, will the Government ignore and refuse to give redress to those whose heavy contributions kept our commerce afloat?

So also in regard to the exculpated cruisers. The losses by them were also presented at Geneva, and were not recognized. But the sacrifice of these claims at Geneva was also a part of the price paid for the indemnity our Government did secure. All and every one of the many classes of claims presented at Geneva constituted the gravamen of our complaint against Great Britain. By the terms of the award, as before stated, the sum agreed on was to be in full satisfaction of all our claims against Great Britain growing out of the depredations of the confederate cruisers. Every meritorious claim of every one of our people which the Government agreed to abandon as a part of the consideration for this fifteen and a half millions our Government is in honor bound to redress, and is in equity and good faith a charge upon the fund itself. I admit the insurance companies are entitled to remuneration. But let them not be so selfish and exacting as to deny the meritorious claims of others. Let them recollect that if our Government had pertinaciously insisted upon having the losses by war premiums and by the exculpated cruisers paid for, the negotiation would have failed, and they (the insurance companies) would have got nothing even for actual loss.

I have said the balance of this fund yet to be distributed will amount to ten or eleven millions of dollars. It belongs to certain of our American citizens. There is enough to satisfy the reasonable demands of all the claimants. We do not know exactly what are the relative amounts contended for by the several classes of claimants, but we have data, as I am credibly informed, that enable us to make a proximate estimate. It is thought that the claims for losses by the exculpated cruisers will amount to about $1,000,000, the excess of war premiums over ordinary marine risks to about $6,000,000. Some allowance must be made for the pruning these several claims must necessarily receive at the hands of the court. From all I can learn, I am inclined to think there is enough of the fund to pay them all, or to come very near it. The bill reported by the Judiciary Committee gives the entirety of one class of claims priority over all of the two last and the entirety of two classes priority over all of the third. Considering the rivalry and, I regret to see, the bad feeling excited among these respective classes of claims, I fear there is not much prospect of harmonizing on that bill; and therefore we must do what is right, and pay the money to actual sufferers. No one has a legal claim to the fund; it is disbursable in the discretion of Congress. Certainly, those who have lost should first be paid. Yet there is a class of sufferers whose claims should at least rank as secondary.

But as the vessels sunk in the sea and their cargoes were the basis of the award, the money must first be paid in rem after claims based on property are satisfied; then, as a secondary loss, claims in personam may be allowed. There are many who suffered in person and health from imprisonment in confederate cruisers; and certainly the residue can be appropriated to no better purpose, for I consider these several classes of claims as equally meritorious; I regard them all as having equal claims upon the equity and good faith of Congress. And yet the claims upon property, for the reasons before given, should be first satisfied. Those who have just claims on this fund ought to have their money, and that as soon as possible. They need it. Financial distress prevails throughout the land. Relief could never come to those entitled to it at a more acceptable time. For the reasons given, I propose an amendment to the bill, providing for the payment of the residue, after satisfying the two classes provided for, to persons who have so suffered in person or health, and let them be paid pro rata if there is not a sufficiency of the fund to pay them all in full.

I wish to make a friendly suggestion to the immediate representatives here of these respective claimants and who feel a proportionate interest in the rights and wishes of their constituents. By your strifes and bickerings, and by your exclusive demands upon the favorable consideration of Congress, you are in danger of sacrificing those whom you wish to serve. Do not forget the fable of the dog and the shadow. By grasping at all, you may lose all.

There is another suggestion I will make in all kindness. There is a large section of this Union whose people have no direct interest in this matter, who have no claims to present, and who will not participate in the distribution of this fund. I mean the Southern States. Still we wish to see the good faith of the Government preserved and the money given where it is rightfully due. I presume I feel on this subject as do the great body of southern representatives here. Compromise it among yourselves, be generous and forbearing, dispose of the question so as to leave no taunts or heart-burnings behind, and we are willing to vote with you in having a final settlement of the matter. But do not expect us to enter into your divisions or to become the partisans of one set of claimants in giving them priority over the others.

I wish to see this question finally disposed of. It will be getting rid of another troublesome subject growing out of the complications of our unfortunate internecine struggle. I wish to God it was the last! Congress will do well to dispose of it now. We may put it off from session to session, but if the money is not paid over to whom it belongs Congress will be besieged with these claims for thirty years to come. Year after year it will give rise to long discussion, until finally it will be paid with heavy interest. So, whether on the score of doing our duty to others or of consulting the economy of the Government or the comfort and convenience of Congress, now is the time to dispose of this matter.

I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] for a question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether the Geneva award covered anything but damages for the destruction of ships and cargoes?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. We have not the data upon which the arbitrators made their award.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Were not all other claims withdrawn?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Not withdrawn.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Or excluded?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. They may have been excluded.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then the Geneva award covered nothing but damages for destruction of ships and cargoes. If that be so, would it not be a breach of faith with Great Britain for Congress to appropriate this money to any purpose except to pay those who suffered from the destruction of ships and cargoes?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I understand the award was given for the purpose of compensating actual sufferers.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It was given for the purpose of compensating those who had ships and cargoes destroyed.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. And those who had ships and cargoes destroyed may have been imprisoned and lost their health, and were therefore sufferers.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Would it not be a breach of faith for Congress to appropriate money to any persons except those who suffered loss from the destruction of ships and cargoes?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Without doubt.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Now, if ships were destroyed, and if the owners of them were re-imbursed by insurance companies, have the shipowners thus re-imbursed any claim upon this fund?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. They certainly would for the amount they lost, for which they were not re-imbursed by the insurance companies.

Mr. LAWRENCE. To the extent to which they were re-imbursed, they would have no claim. Now one thing more. If the insurance companies——

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I do not object to being catechised, but I would respectfully state to the gentleman from Ohio, that if he wishes to pursue this investigation further he can do it next week, and by an examination of the files of the State Department he can obtain more information than I can give him.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I expect to pursue the inquiry next week, but my design was to have the gentleman from Mississippi testify personally to the assertions I have made.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I will only say, in conclusion, that I wish to thank the gentleman from Ohio for the good faith and appreciation he has for my testimony, as I have certainly testified to the truth in the remarks which I have concluded.

TEXAS BORDER TROUBLES.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee in relation to the Texas border troubles be made a special order for Monday next at two o'clock, or immediately after the Geneva award bill has been disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. Say immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday.

Mr. DURHAM. I must object, as there are other special orders which have also been postponed.

Mr. HURLBUT. Then in behalf of the chairman of the Committee of the Texas Investigation, I give notice that on Monday next I will endeavor to call up that special order.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN the post-office appropriation bill, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with the amendments of the Senate, ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the legislative, executive, judicial, &c., appropriation bill, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and moved that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and upon that motion called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MIAMI INDIANS.

On motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 619) to carry out in part the provisions of the act entitled "An act to abolish the tribal relations with the Miami Indians, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LOUISIANA INVESTIGATION.

Mr. LEVY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the House of Representatives to investigate the custom-house and other Government offices in Louisiana, and also the alleged outrages at Coushatta, be, and is hereby, further instructed to investigate and report upon the outrages alleged to have been recently committed in the parish of West Feliciana, in said State; and that said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is invested with authority to visit said parish, make the necessary investigation, to summon and administer oaths to witnesses, and to send for persons and papers; and in regard to this additional duty is clothed with all the powers heretofore conferred on said committee by resolution of this House.

Mr. LEVY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORT ROYAL HARBOR.

Mr. SMALLS. By unanimous consent introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3690) to authorize the construction of docks, warehouses and other buildings for shipping accommodations at Port Royal Harbor in South Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 166) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with leave to report back at any time.

The bill was read.

Mr. BANNING. Why not put it on its passage?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire what the effect of the bill is? No one can tell from the reading of it. I think it had better go to the committee.

Mr. BANKS. I object to granting privilege to the committee to report at any time.

Mr. DIBRELL. Very well; let it take the usual course.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to ask the House to allow bills from the Senate upon the Speaker's table, to be taken up and referred.

No objection was made.

The following bills from the Senate were severally taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (S. No. 720) for the relief of Charles B. Phillips—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 49) to confirm to the State of Florida the swamp and overflowed lands granted under the act of September 28, 1850—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of the sureties of J. W. P. Huntingdon, deceased, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 737) granting a pension to Harrison H. Dodds—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 767) granting a pension to Theodore Gardner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 774) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel Jones, of Virginia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 398) for the relief of Luther Hall—to the Committee on Patents.

A bill (S. No. 842) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to remove the jail on Judiciary Square to grounds near to the Washington Asylum for the use of the District—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. No. 685) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 803) to repeal "An act granting a pension to Mary H. Bartlett," approved January 28, 1873, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 240) relating to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. No. 715) for the relief of Samuel H. Canfield, postmaster at Seymour, Connecticut—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. No. 816) granting a pension to Laura M. Knowlton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The following bills of the House, returned from the Senate with amendments, were then taken from the Speaker's table, and, with the Senate amendments, referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1970) relating to the approval of bills in the Territory of Arizona—to the Committee on Territories.

A bill (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government—to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the various votes by which the bills from the Speaker's table have been referred; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POWDER MAGAZINE AT CHELSEA, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. FROST, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Whereas the powder magazine located upon Mystic River, in the city of Chelsea, Massachusetts, threatens danger to the lives and property of the people of that city and also of Boston, and endangers the safety and perpetuity of the Bunker Hill monument: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be requested to consider the propriety of reporting a bill providing for the removal of the said powder magazine to a location where such danger cannot exist.

REAL-ESTATE-POOL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. GLOVER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Select Committee of Investigation on Real-Estate Pool and Jay Cooke & Co.'s Indebtedness have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

WILLIAM A. DOUGLASS.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3691) for the relief of William A. Douglass, postmaster at Hunter, Greene County, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe that under the rule all bills introduced by unanimous consent are referred to committees, not to be brought back into the House on motions to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the rule of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to call attention to that fact, because had there been no such rule I would have moved to reconsider and table the reference of the bill just introduced.

CAPTAIN M. L. COURTNEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on House bill No. 3091, for the relief of Captain M. L. Courtney, Twenty-fifth Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WHITE AND COLORED TROOPS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement showing the difference in the cost of remounting, clothing, and providing labor for white and colored troops; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina, was granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, was granted leave of absence for four days from Monday next.

Mr. EVANS was granted leave of absence for ten days from the 12th instant.

Mr. NASH was granted leave of absence for three weeks from Monday next.

Mr. THORNBURGH was granted leave of absence for five days.

Mr. CABELL was granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. RAINEY was granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. SMALLS was granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. HARALSON was granted leave of absence for six days.

Mr. HUNTER was granted leave of absence for ten days from Monday next.

Mr. STOWELL was granted leave of absence for one week.

COMMITTEE ON MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. SPENCER, of Louisiana, in place of Mr. Morey, on the Select Committee on the Mississippi Levees.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and for other purposes.

Mr. HURLBUT. I renew my motion that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Memorial of the National Tobacco Association of the United States, against any decrease of the duty on imported cigars, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. WELLS, of Missouri: The petition of William Roach, that he be paid a portion of the money appropriated by Congress for the relief of the sufferers by the explosion at the United States arsenal in Washington, District of Columbia, June, 1864, his daughter Ellen, who contributed mainly to the support of the petitioner and his family, having been killed by said explosion, to the Committee of Claims.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 12, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

MICHAEL W. BROCK—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill No. 165, entitled "An act for the relief of Michael W. Brock, of Meigs County, Tennessee, late a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Volunteers."

The objection to affixing my signature to this bill may be found in the indorsement (which accompanies this message) by the Adjutant-General of the Army.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 9, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the indorsement.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 8, 1876.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

The records of this Office show that Michael W. Brock, Company D, Tenth Tennessee Volunteers, deserted November 24, 1864, due the United States for horse and horse-equipments, carbine, saber, and pistol, all complete.

He presented satisfactory evidence of his having left the service by proper authority, and the charge of desertion has been removed and the soldier furnished an honorable discharge.

No evidence has been presented to this Office to establish that he was erroneously charged with Government property.

If satisfactory evidence is furnished showing conclusively that this soldier was erroneously charged with Government property taken at the time of his reported desertion, the charge will be removed; and in that case the inclosed act for his relief will be unnecessary.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President?

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill and accompanying message be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that the papers be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of D. H. Hill, of Charlotte, North Carolina, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Theodore Barnes and other citizens of Washington occupying stalls and stands in the Center or Washington market-house, praying Congress to pass the bill (H. R. No. 2339) to amend the charter of the Washington Market Company; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented the petition of George E. Warner, late a private in the Seventeenth New York Independent Battery, praying for an extension of time within which to prosecute his claim for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of William A. Brown and 400 other citizens of Nebraska City, Nebraska, praying that Congress take some action for the protection of the port of Nebraska City and the improvement of the Missouri River at that point; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EATON. I present a memorial of citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 3187, to amend title 53 of the Revised Statutes, known as the shipping act. It is signed by very eminent gentlemen, shipping-merchants and other business men. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of the Albany Institute, a venerable institution, existing since 1793, signed by its president, John V. L. Pruyn, and its other officers and members, favoring the establishment and maintenance of an international bureau of weights and measures. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of ten business men of McConnellsburgh, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the tariff laws at the present time; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of Isabelle George, of Goffstown, New Hampshire, widow of Albert T. George, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2752) to change the name of the schooner Mayflower;

A bill (H. R. No. 2860) to facilitate and encourage philosophical, mechanical, and scientific exhibitions and experiments at the centennial exhibition;

A bill (H. R. No. 3398) for the issue of coin and other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3200) to change the name of the steam-barge Dolphin, of Clayton, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 3678) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Lydia to that of Sylph;

A bill (H. R. No. 3688) to amend an act entitled "An act supplementary to the acts in relation to immigration," approved March 3, 1875; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 320) to reduce the number and increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado;

A bill (S. No. 692) to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress; and

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that Mr. CHARLES FOSTER, of Ohio, had been appointed a manager on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, in place of Mr. WALDRON, excused.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes; and that it had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the foregoing report.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 332) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 353) to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1071) for the relief of Lieutenant James B. Sinclair, United States Army.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills:

An act (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1071) for the relief of Lieutenant James B. Sinclair, United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1800) for the relief of Kendrick & Avis; Kuner, Zisemann & Zott; Kuner & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri; and Nachtrieb & Co., of Galion, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds;

A bill (H. R. No. 2140) establishing Cheboygan, in the State of Michigan, a port of delivery;

A bill (H. R. No. 2434) to amend section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to extradition;

A bill (H. R. No. 3573) to amend an act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, approved December 28, 1874; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2134) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of L. Madison Day, of Louisiana, praying for the return of the purchase-money of certain real estate sold to him by the marshal of the United States of the district of Louisiana in pursuance of a decree of the district court of the United States for Louisiana, under the act of Congress of July 17, 1862, known as the confiscation act, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 916) for the relief of L. Madison Day, of Louisiana.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish the Senator would withhold the report. I desire to make an adverse report as a member of the committee dissenting from the views of the majority. It has been usual in all these cases to have both reports presented at the same time.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The majority of the committee instructed me to make the report on the following day after their meeting, and I have delayed it until now. I supposed the minority report was ready. However, I have no objection to deferring my report until the Senator from Missouri is ready to submit the views of the minority.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that would be most convenient.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend from Missouri that there will be no difficulty in filing the views of the minority at any time hereafter, and the report of the majority can be made now.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1807) for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis, of Alexandria, Virginia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to submit the views of the minority of the Committee on Public Lands on the bill (S. No. 445) for the relief of settlers on public lands in the State of California. The majority report in this case was made on the 28th of March last by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD.] I move that the views of the minority be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 917) to enable Erastus T. Bussell, of Indianapolis, Indiana, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for a "combined rubber and spiral steel spring;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 918) granting a pension to Ellen W. Thornton, widow of the late Captain James S. Thornton, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CRAGIN. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to this bill. Captain Thornton was executive officer on board the Kearsarge at the time of the fight with the Alabama, and to him more than any other man was due the victory on that occasion. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 919) for the relief of Allen C. Hammond, George Seibert, and William Megarey, sureties on the bond of Dennis Murphy, deceased, late paymaster at Harper's Ferry armory, in West Virginia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAVIS. This, I think, is a meritorious case. When the accounts were settled at the Department there was not a balance found due to these gentlemen. By the books apparently there is a balance. The papers, however, explain that pretty fully, and I have gotten all the information the Department is in possession of. I move that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with the hope that they will examine it, and, if it is a meritorious case, report at an early day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 920) to authorize Louis Petaskey to enter a certain tract of land which embraces his home and improvements; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 921) to establish post-roads in the State of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to suggest that we must meet on Friday. I understand that the court of impeachment adjourned until Friday. We cannot adjourn later than Thursday. If there is not to be a quorum here, and it appears pretty plainly there will not be——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Long?

Mr. ANTHONY. If there should be a quorum, I suppose there are so many pairs that no business of much importance could be transacted, nothing but what can be done by universal consent and finished up almost any morning hour. Therefore, would it not be better for us to have an agreement now that when we meet to-morrow we shall adjourn until Friday, and that when we meet on Friday we shall adjourn to Monday? I suggest that that be entered on the Journal by common consent, and then Senators will have at their own disposal time which, it seems, will be of no value in the Senate as we are constituted at present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There should be a quorum here on Friday. We might be left without a quorum on Friday under the arrangement suggested.

Mr. ANTHONY. I make the suggestion in order to see if it meets the views of Senators.

Mr. CAPERTON. Why not adjourn for two days at this time? What is the use of coming back to-morrow? If we adjourn over to-day, we cannot adjourn to a later day than Thursday. Then we shall have to meet on Thursday and adjourn until Friday, because the court meets on Friday.

Mr. CONKLING. It is just as broad as it is long. You will have to meet to-morrow if you adjourn from to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. But if we have an agreement that when we meet to-morrow we shall adjourn until Friday, and that when we meet on Friday, after transacting the business of the court, we shall adjourn until Monday, then the members of the Senate will have this time to themselves. I simply make the suggestion; I make no motion. If the suggestion does not meet the views of Senators, let the other motion be put.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difficulty about the last part of the proposition is that on Friday, which is the day of the court, I understand, it is to be hoped and presumed that there will be a quorum here. Otherwise the court could not take even the simplest step, which is merely one of receiving the pleadings, &c. Therefore I wish the Senator from Rhode Island would modify his proposition, by general consent, so as merely to carry us to Friday with the expectation that on that day there will be a quorum; and then the Senate can go on and do business on Friday and on Saturday if it chooses. I have no objection to the proposition that we adjourn now and when we meet to-morrow that without reading the Journal we shall adjourn until Friday; but I do not think it ought to go beyond that, because on Friday we ought to have a quorum, and must have one.

Mr. MORTON. I make the suggestion that the Senate adjourn until Thursday, and we cannot adjourn longer than three days at a time, with the understanding that when we meet on Thursday we shall adjourn at once until Friday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would do it. That is the same thing.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is better.

Mr. MORTON. I move therefore that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday.

Mr. WRIGHT. My proposition is that when we adjourn to-day we meet on Thursday, and it was made with the very idea of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let there be an understanding that on Thursday we shall adjourn until Friday without transacting any business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair will ask consent to that after he puts the question on adjourning to Thursday, if that is agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. COCKRELL. A few days ago it was urged very persistently as a reason why the trial on the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap should not be set for the 19th of June that we were pressed with appropriation bills which were pending before the Senate and which must be passed before the 1st day of July. We have passed one such bill, I believe, since that order of the Senate, and now the proposition is to adjourn in effect until that time. We are to adjourn until Thursday, and then to adjourn until Friday. I presume that is to accommodate gentlemen who desire to attend the Cincinnati convention. If it is done for that purpose, as a matter of course the same courtesy will be expected and extended in regard to the Saint Louis convention, and that would consume all of week after next.

If that is the intention and purpose of this adjournment, it does seem to me that it would be infinitely better that some arrangement should be made with the House of Representatives. If we are to do no business until after the two national conventions have assembled and adjourned, let there be an understanding to that effect. We cannot adjourn for a longer time than three days without their consent, nor can they adjourn longer than three days at a time without our consent. Doubtless some of them want to attend both those conventions, and it does seem to me that we ought to have some consultation with them in regard to it. We should not adjourn without an agreement to that effect; and, even if there were such an agreement, I should be opposed to either the Senate or the House adjourning. I think we are sent here to attend to the business of the Senate and that we should do it. I desire simply now to say that I am opposed to any proposition for adjournment, and I think the Senate should go on and do its work.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not a matter of courtesy or a matter of convenience; it is a matter of necessity, from the fact that we have not a quorum and cannot transact business. The question is for us to consider whether those of us who are here shall come up every morning and, finding no quorum, adjourn as a matter of necessity, or whether we shall have the disposition of the time to ourselves. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that but one appropriation bill has passed since the Senate sat as a court of impeachment. Three appropriation bills have passed since that time. I would much rather stay here and pass the appropriation bills than to take a recess now which we shall have to pay for in July, and perhaps in August; but unless we have a quorum we cannot transact any business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I apprehend that there is a quorum here in the city of Washington, and probably now in the Senate Chamber. I do not think that is the objection or that it can be any objection. If we are going to adjourn for the accommodation of friends who desire to go to the convention, let us say so and have some understanding about it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Those who desire to go to the convention have already gone. Nobody remaining here is desirous to go.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then let us adjourn to accommodate them and others who want to go, if there are any others, but not adjourn simply because we have no quorum, without saying why it is that we have no quorum here.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire of the Chair whether a quorum is not requisite to adjourn from now until Thursday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CONKLING. So I understand. The record then, when we have adjourned, will show that there was a quorum not only in the city but in the Chamber, and that that quorum adjourned until Thursday with or without some understanding that then a further adjournment should be had until Friday, and then until Monday; in short that no business is to be done this week.

I do not wish to interpose against the convenience of anybody. This question, however, presents itself apparently as one governing the conduct of the Senate in its own behalf. The House of Representatives has made no request of us. If it had, certainly we ought to take that into account, because, as has been said, the House cannot adjourn for more than three days without our concurrence, and that concurrence being asked we ought to consider it. We are acting in reference to our own judgment and our own convenience. Senators who wish to attend the national convention about to sit have gone, as I understand. I know of no Senator, I have heard of no Senator, who is here, who wishes or means to go to the convention. Then as a matter of convenience why should we adjourn? If we have a quorum, we know there is business to do, and enough of it, and we are admonished very properly by the Senator from Rhode Island that every hour of time which we take now is to be paid for again when the weather is hotter; which he says will be, very likely, in August.

It seems to me, (and I make this remark by way of suggestion, being very willing to acquiesce in what seems convenient to other Senators,) that if there is, as I believe there is, from looking about the Chamber, and as the record, if we adjourn until Thursday, will imply that there is, a quorum here, we had better go on and transact the business which would naturally proceed, a quorum being present. A Senator near me, [Mr. HOWE,] who seems to have counted, says that by his count there is actually a quorum in the Senate Chamber. I see other Senators assent to that; and I think I know of Senators quite near by whom I do not see at this moment. I would suggest, Mr. President, that we go on and do such business as we have and make such progress as we can.

Mr. MORTON. In making the motion I did not consult my own convenience. I do not expect to go away, and I would just as soon come here and spend the day as remain at my hotel, and indeed would prefer doing so. I made the motion at the suggestion of several Senators who thought there would be no business done if we staid here, but who, if an adjournment took place, would utilize the time. On Saturday we had a bare quorum; but it could not be maintained, and I believe the Senate adjourned without doing anything. I think that is the apprehension in regard to this week; but, as I am just as patriotic as anybody, I am willing to stay here. I have not the slightest interest in the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have had the experience of passing through six periods in Congress when presidential nominations have been made. I have heard the speech made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] six times, and perhaps have made it two or three times myself, but yet never have I seen any work done during the week when one of the great political parties of the country held a national convention. While we find ourselves here with barely a quorum during the republican convention, I tell my friend that week after next when the democratic convention is going on at Saint Louis the House of Representatives will be entirely without a quorum. We may preach against it and talk against it, and say these gentlemen had better be here to attend to the business for which they are paid, but that makes no difference. These great occasions do call men of both political parties from their appropriate duties to attend to a very peculiar and singular feature of the American Government, that is, a popular movement to initiate and nominate the candidates for President of the United States, and whether we will or no the ordinary functions of legislation will stop when this occasion arises by either party.

Therefore, it is entirely unwise in the Senate to undertake this week to do any kind of legislation. We may have a quorum here; but when we come to a question of any moment it will be found that several Senators are paired; and they cannot vote because they are paired, and we shall make no progress. I am told that no appropriation bill is ready, and therefore we can only take up and act upon unobjected cases which is the most dangerous form of legislation, because those who ought to object are not here to object.

I am willing to stay here this week right along every day, to come up at twelve o'clock and be here promptly in my seat; but there is nothing that we could do, and we should be only wasting time. I think the better way would be for the rest of us to adjourn to Philadelphia and go to see the centennial exposition, and inform and instruct ourselves in one of the great institutions of modern time, one of the most instructive lessons that any one, wise or great, little or otherwise, can have. We cannot do anything here this week, because if we had a quorum the quorum would disappear. I shall therefore vote for the proposition to adjourn over the longest time that is named.

Mr. INGALLS. I regret that a motion to adjourn has been made, and I should regret still more if it should prevail, for it is evident if we adjourn over this week that there is one other week in this month when we shall be called upon to transact no business, and that will throw us into the early part of July. Upon the 6th of July, I believe, we are to proceed with the trial of the impeachment case; and the consequence would be that in the transaction of the ordinary business of the session we should be detained here perhaps until August, or even later than that. There are upon the Calendar a very large number of cases to which there is no conceivable objection, cases which have been reported by various committees of this body, some of them bills from the House of Representatives that only await the bare formal action of the Senate to become laws. Among them are twenty or thirty bills that have been reported by the Committee on Pensions. These are merely formal matters. The reports even are never called upon to be read. The action of the committee is taken for granted as being correct, and whenever the bills are read they are acted upon without any inquiry or objection. There is a large amount of this kind of business that could be acted upon, and acted upon to-day. I should be very glad if the Senate would proceed and allow me this morning to call up the bills reported by the Committee on Pensions for action by the Senate. In that way I think we could dispose of a great deal of business that would not only be advantageous to individuals, but beneficial to the country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I shall stay here through August with no more reluctance perhaps than any other Senator; but it seems to me there is a quorum present ready for the transaction of business. I hardly see why we should spend the time in debating about there being a quorum present, when by actual count there are at least thirty-eight Senators here. I do not know, but I have understood that less than ten are absent at Cincinnati, and there are only five who are away in Mississippi. Therefore, there should be sixty Senators in the city to-day. I presume there are that number in the city, and I do not see why we may not go on and transact business as usual. I hope, therefore, there will be no adjournment whatever.

Mr. COCKRELL. I concur with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and think it is very probable that just what he predicts will occur. If that is going to occur, let us say frankly and plainly to the country that it will occur, and not go to adjourning over until Wednesday or Thursday or Friday. Let us have the arrangement made and adjourn during this week. The Senate can meet on Friday, and then adjourn over until Monday. Then there will be another week between that and the democratic convention which meets at Saint Louis on the 27th of June, in which both Houses can be here. Then the House of Representatives will probably want to adjourn from the Saturday preceding until that is over. Then let us have that understanding, and make the adjournment accordingly; that is, if we cannot do any business. If that is true, if the Senator from Ohio is correct in supposing that we cannot keep Senators here, and cannot retain them in the Senate for the transaction of business, I think that course would be infinitely better; but I am opposed to adjourning at all. I think we have the power to summon absent Senators here. We ought certainly to have some power in that respect, and we ought to transact the business of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to say that I have no doubt the House of Representatives can this week go on and transact the ordinary business of the House. One of the members of the House who is responsible for much of the business there says that they expect to go on and perfect the appropriation bills this week. Week after next they will be in the same condition we are, and we can then go on and transact public business, because we shall have a majority here who will not take any interest in the Saint Louis convention.

Mr. EATON. They may take an interest in it in November.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care anything about that. It is a matter of great indifference to the country and to us, and I leave it to futurity. But that is neither here nor there. If we could go on now and transact business I would be willing to do so. I am told that there are thirty-five or forty Senators here, which is a little more than a quorum. If you try the experiment, in ten minutes you will find that if a vote is called there will be less than a quorum.

Mr. WRIGHT. I made the motion to adjourn over until Thursday for the reason that I was satisfied, as I am yet, that if we meet here to-morrow morning and on Wednesday morning we shall be compelled to adjourn at once. I think that my record will show that I have as persistently opposed adjournment over for two or three days as any member of the Senate. I doubt whether there is a quorum in the city at this time. If there be, I am just as certain that after we have progressed a little way with our business we shall find ourselves without a quorum. Then we should come back here to-morrow and go through the same experience. I am just as anxious to progress with business as any member of this body, and I will so cast my vote all the time, if I know what I am doing, as to assist in the progress of business; but I do not think there is any propriety or any wisdom in our remaining here and adjourning over until to-morrow, then coming here and adjourning until Wednesday, and so on from day to day, taking up the time of Senators in that way. I think we can be more profitably employed by proceeding with our work in the committee-rooms, and getting ready for the sessions next week. We are compelled to take that course for we cannot progress with our work now. The other House can progress with their work now if they see proper. If I believed we could do anything to the interest and profit and benefit of the public business by continuing here, I should vote against adjournment; but it is hardly right to the public business that we should progress here with a bare quorum, supposing we had that, and transact what may turn out to be the most important business.

I therefore have made the motion that we adjourn over until Thursday. If that should be voted down, then I am as much in favor as anybody else of progressing with the business, and, there being a quorum to-morrow, progressing with the business then; but, as I do not believe there will be a quorum to-day or to-morrow or the next day, I have made this proposition. If the Senate votes otherwise, I expect to remain here, and do the best we can; but, if we do have a quorum now, I think the moment when we come to a vote it will disclose the fact that we have not a quorum, and cannot go on.

Mr. MAXEY. The record will show that I have attended all the sessions of the Senate since the opening of the present session. It is too far from here to Texas for me to go home for a few days. Therefore I have no interest in wanting an adjournment; but it is perfectly manifest to me that we are not going to do any business, and I think it is idle and useless to remain here and do nothing, for whenever a question of any importance comes up, there being so many already paired, I think you will not have a quorum voting. Hence, I think the suggestion that we had better go to the Centennial or somewhere else and learn something is a very good one. It is perfectly manifest that we shall do nothing here this week. I do not care to come up to the Capitol daily for a useless purpose. Being satisfied that we can do no business, I think the motion to adjourn to Thursday is correct. We cannot adjourn longer than then, and when Thursday comes then we may adjourn until the meeting of the court, and afterward adjourn to Monday.

Mr. McCREERY. It is perfectly manifest to my mind that the only way we can do any business is to do it. If this debate continues, certainly nothing can be done. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn over.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I concur with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] In addition to what he has stated, I believe it is a courtesy due to absent Senators that we should adjourn. I therefore favor the adjournment if we have no other reason than courtesy; but it is plain that we can do little or no business here, and in a few weeks this same courtesy extended to Senators on this side might be very acceptable. Therefore I favor the adjournment.

Mr. HOWE. It seems to me I have never seen so happy a time to do business as the present. We have a constitutional quorum here; there is no doubt about that. Then we have a larger number of Senators than we have had during many years of the time since I have had a seat in the Chamber. Then the great advantage of the position is that there is not enough of either party here to do any mischief. We have got to work together or not work at all. It seems to me this is just the juncture to do up our work; and by and by, when there is a preponderence of one party or the other, we can attend to that which is not work, but is something else. I think we ought to improve this occasion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. ANTHONY. Had we not better let this motion lie over until a later part of the day? I would be in favor of an adjournment; but if there is a quorum here to transact business I would prefer to stay.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us try it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island suggest that the motion lie over by common consent?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not press the request.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Caperton, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Maxey, Norwood, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Wadleigh, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Barnum, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Dawes, Eaton, Ferry, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kernan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Robertson, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones of Nevada, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Thurman, West, and Windom—34.

So the motion was not agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF DISTRICT TAX-LIST.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether any costs or charges have been paid by property-owners within the District for or on account of the publication of the list of delinquent tax-payers prior to the publication of such list, and, if any, what amount of costs and charges have been so paid, together with the names of the persons so paying the same and the amount paid by each person.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say, in offering the resolution, that the reason for making the inquiry is that I am informed and believe that persons who have not paid their taxes prior to a contract entered into with Mr. Murtagh for the publication of the delinquent tax-list of this District, but who paid their taxes before any publication of that list was made, were charged a very considerable amount of expense by reason of a contract which had been made for which no service could possibly have been rendered, because if they paid the tax no publication of their names as delinquents could appear. My attention was called to this fact by a gentleman from the Eastern Shore of Maryland, who owned some property in this District. He came to my rooms, being an acquaintance of mine, and told me he had been to the collector's office for the purpose of paying his tax and that they refused it. I was coming to the Capitol, and accompanied him to the office, and I asked them to receive his tax. They hesitated, but finally agreed to receive it, but charged him upon $4.90 tax-costs amounting to $3. I have his bill in my pocket. I protested for him against it, because there had been no publication at that time of any delinquents. I told them this gentleman was two hundred miles from home, and was compelled to submit to the exaction or to incur the expense of returning to this city. I have his bill here, [producing a bill.] His tax was $4.90, and they charged him $3 costs prior to the publication of the delinquent list. Such a thing I protested in their presence was an outrage; and I think it is a matter which the Senate ought to inquire into. I do not hesitate to say that if I was the prosecuting attorney in this District, so far as I understand the law, I would prosecute any man who would exact from another charges and costs not authorized by law.

It is for the purpose of ascertaining what has been the amount of exactions which have been made of that character that I offer the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator that he add to the resolution that they furnish a copy of the contract.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to amend the resolution by adding:

And that they furnish a copy of the contract for printing such list, and the amount paid under such contract.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Secretary will report the first case on the Calendar at the point where its consideration was last suspended.

WESTERN AND ATLANTIC RAILROAD.

The first bill on the Calendar at the point where its consideration was last left off was the bill (S. No. 177) to authorize the Secretary of War to adjust and settle claims of the State of Georgia against the Government on account of the Western and Atlantic Railroad.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] who had that bill in charge spoke to me upon the subject before he left town, and, as I understood him, he did not wish it taken up in his absence. I ask, therefore, that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

TAXATION OF RAILROAD LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1545) declaring lands heretofore granted to certain railroad companies subject to State taxation.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator who reported that bill [Mr. OGLESBY] is absent, and I suggest that it be laid over until his return.

DISTRICT JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 525) to amend section 994 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the section named so as to read:

Justices of the peace shall be appointed for the term of three years, and shall take an oath for the faithful and impartial discharge of the duties of their office, for which they shall give bond in the same manner as constables are or may be required by law to give bond.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the gentleman having that bill in charge explain how it alters the law.

Mr. MERRIMON. It requires a justice of the peace to give a bond like a constable. That is the principal object. I understand their records are very loosely kept, and sometimes inefficient persons are appointed. The bill has the approbation of the chief justice of the District, and is regarded as necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These justices of the peace exercise only judicial functions, do they not?

Mr. MERRIMON. That is all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any precedents in the States or elsewhere for requiring judicial officers to give bond?

Mr. MERRIMON. I think they have been required to do so heretofore. The object is to require them to keep their record safe. I believe a loose practice prevails now; their records lie about loose; they carry them in their pockets or in some careless place, and often they are lost.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not only that, but I suppose like justices of the peace in Ohio, they collect money and often have large sums in their hands.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think they do sometimes receive money. It has been so long since the bill was reported that I do not recollect it distinctly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do they receive money officially as justices?

Mr. SHERMAN. They collect money; receive it for anybody. They have jurisdiction to the amount of $100.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In their official capacity, do you mean?

Mr. INGALLS. In their official capacity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They hear a suit, decide it, take the money, and pay it over to the suitor. Are they required to give any bonds in Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. So I understand. I have forgotten whether they do or not, but I know they collect money. They are the great collectors of small sums of money in our State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They differ from our collectors.

Mr. MERRIMON. This bill has the approval of the chief justice of the District, and is regarded as important, I know, by some leading members of the legal profession in the District. I do not remember all the details about it, for it is some time since I reported the bill; but I remember that the committee were very well satisfied that this amendment ought to be made in the law, and they came to that conclusion after a very thorough investigation of the matter.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not yet see the force of this bill; I mean in a proper sense. I see precisely what the point is; but justices of the peace in the District of Columbia are not authorized by law or required by law to receive moneys on judgments that they render. If they receive moneys, it must be because the parties choose to allow them to become bailees. Their judgments are either that in criminal cases the delinquent shall pay a fine into the treasury of the District, or in civil cases that the defendant who is beaten shall pay a certain sum of money to the plaintiff, and the marshal, or constable, or bailiff, or whatever he is called, collects it, and he, giving an official bond, is liable to pay it over to the plaintiff. I do not know any law in the District of Columbia that recognizes even the fact that a justice of the peace in his official capacity is to have any moneys paid into his court under any circumstances; and that being so, it does not appear to me that it is right to require these judicial officers to give bond. But I do not want to take up time with it.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to make an inquiry. Where judgment is rendered, may not the party obviate the expense of an execution by going to the justice and paying the sum? It is usual in the States; otherwise the constable would always get the fees out of him and make him trouble.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He may go to the plaintiff with it.

Mr. KERNAN. The plaintiff is not always willing to take it in that way. I think the usual practice, to save the expense of an execution, is to pay to the justice and have the judgment satisfied. That is the case in many of the States, I am sure.

Mr. MERRIMON. My recollection is that the principal ground for requiring magistrates to give bond in this District is that their papers and their judgments, which belong to their courts, are not records, but they are quasi records, and they keep their offices in a very loose way, and it is said that some of them in the past have not been very responsible. They do not have clerks, like ordinary courts of record. They keep their own papers; they keep their offices in their pockets and wherever it is convenient to do so, and very loosely. Sometimes they receive money and they hold it for suitors. That is the practice, and I am not sure that under the law they may not do it. At all events, on looking into the whole matter and consulting the chief justice, it was deemed wise that the law should be amended in this respect. These justices are not regular judicial officers. Their office in this respect is rather quasi than otherwise.

The object of this proposed amendment of the Revised Statutes is to strengthen this office, make it more responsible, conduce more to the public convenience and safety. I recollect that the very objection that the Senator from Vermont suggests now occurred to my mind; I was astonished to hear it suggested that a judicial officer ought to give a bond; but when I come to look into the matter—and I repeat again I do not remember all the details—when the details were brought to my attention I was satisfied the bill ought to pass, and joined in the judgment of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should think it would be better, if these officers did not do their duty, to turn them out and put in somebody who would do it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Unfortunately that is not always done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I never knew a bond to do any good, but I am not going to delay the business of the Senate—it is in a hurry—by asking that the thing be put off. Let us take the vote upon it by a division.

Mr. WHYTE. The duties of justices of the peace in this District are similar to those of justices of the peace in our State, and their practice has been regulated upon pretty much the same principle. We have discovered that it is absolutely necessary to require justices of the peace to give bond; and at the very last session of our Legislature we required a bond from justices of the peace. Almost all the fines that are imposed are paid to the magistrate, and there is no security that they ever reach the public treasury at all. Besides, their judgments are not judgments entered as of record; they are entered on the back of the precept, and upon the receipt of the money they are delivered to the party against whom the judgment is rendered. It has been discovered to be absolutely necessary to require a bond from these magistrates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 26, noes 4; no quorum voting.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PADDOCK. Before the roll is called, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to invite the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the roll will develop whether there is a quorum or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is in order, but the call of the roll will develop whether there be a quorum or not. Does the Senator from Nebraska insist on his motion?

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, sir; I think it had better be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. How can he tell who is absent?

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. NORWOOD, (at one o'clock and eleven minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MERRIMON. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken; resulted—yeas 6, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Caperton, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Norwood, and Robertson—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Barnum, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Dorsey, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—30.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn, but there is no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose it is in order to invite absentees to come in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That order is under execution already.

Mr. MERRIMON. We know that half an hour ago a quorum of Senators was present; I think those who are not in the Chamber now are near by. I move again that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to request the presence of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order has been passed, and the Sergeant-at-Arms is now executing it.

Mr. PADDOCK, (at one o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) I think there is a quorum present now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Enough Senators have come in since the roll-call to make a quorum. The Chair believes a quorum is present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Ought there not to be another count?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will count the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. Do I understand the Chair to say that a quorum is present?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Chair is counting the Senate to ascertain the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (after counting the Senate.) There is not a quorum present. Enough who did not vote have come in to make a quorum, but some other Senators have gone out.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is the order executed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms has commenced executing the order; it is now in process of execution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, (at one o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MERRIMON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Caperton, Christiancy, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Kelly, McCreery, Morton, Norwood, Wadleigh, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Barnum, Cockrell, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kernan, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Dorsey, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Thurman, West, and Windom—36.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn. A quorum is present.

Mr. WHYTE. The question pending, I believe, is to take the yeas and yeas on ordering to be engrossed the bill in regard to justices of the peace in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, on which the yeas and nays were ordered for the purpose of ascertaining the presence of a quorum. Is the call for the yeas and nays insisted upon?

Mr. MERRIMON. A quorum being here now, I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays if it be competent for me to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe the yeas and nays were ordered upon that question; but if they were, as a quorum is present, I have no disposition to have the yeas and nays called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was intimated that the yeas and nays were ordered for the purpose of ascertaining the presence of a quorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to withdrawing the call, but I wish to have the Journal show the fact.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWES. The title of the bill ought to be amended. There is no indication in the title of the bill as to what is the subject-matter of the bill. I move to add "concerning justices of the peace."

The amendment was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, it is manifest that we are not going to progress very rapidly or very satisfactorily in the discharge of the public business in the next two or three days. I think the trial of the last half hour ought to prove conclusively to every Senator that it will really promote the public business if the Senate adjourn temporarily. I therefore rise to renew the motion that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Thursday next, with the understanding that that will be a mere formal meeting and an adjournment will then take place until Friday when we shall meet as a court of impeachment. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I voted against this proposition when it was up before, but I am quite satisfied that we shall make no progress. I shall now vote for it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I voted against the motion before and shall vote the same way now. I am opposed to the adjournment, and think we can stay here and transact the business which is before us; but it seems impossible to keep a quorum in the Senate Chamber. Although there are thirty-nine to forty-one Senators present in the Capitol building, we cannot keep them in the Senate Chamber. I shall not call for the yeas and nays, but simply desire to express my disapprobation of the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it understood among us that on Thursday there will be only a formal meeting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was going to state what the Chair understood to be the proposition of the Senator from Maryland, that the meeting on Thursday should be merely formal for the purpose of adjourning till Friday, when it is necessary for the Senate to meet as a court of impeachment.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be then no business at all transacted on Thursday, so that the presence of any of the Senators will not be required. The President will have to be here, of course, and some one Senator to make a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion requires unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it ought to be entered in the Journal. I do not think it ever has been.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the RECORD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the CONGESSIONAL RECORD. But an understanding of this kind does not go into the Journal as an order of the Senate agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Chair should have said that it would so appear in the RECORD and he meant to say "the RECORD."

Mr. WHYTE. I have moved that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and thirty-nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 12, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour begins at half past twelve o'clock; and this being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing.

BOARD OF NAVAL COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3692) for the establishment of a board of commissioners for the Navy of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER. I call for the reading of that bill.

The bill, after being read at length, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. THOMPSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KASSON called for the reading of the bill; and it was read in full.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

UNPAID CLAIMS OF REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

Mr. THOMPSON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3694) for the settlement of the unpaid claims of those officers of the line of the revolutionary army who served to the close of the war of Independence and so returned on the books of the Treasury; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER called for the reading of the bill in full; and it was read.

The bill was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LORD introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 121) to amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILLIS. For the purpose of information and not for delay, I call for the reading of this resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas under the Constitution all the officers of the United States, numbering with dependents about one hundred thousand, penetrating into every part of the country and having charge of its transmitted intelligence, are commissioned by the President, and are, through the power of appointment and removal, subject to the coercion of any administration in power, and required to act, vote, and contribute money in accordance with the central will, whereby both the caucuses and the elections are controlled; and whereas such relations between the administration and the officers of the Government tend not only to defeat the will of the majority and to degrade the independence and fidelity of such officers, but to relax the rules of official accountability, which it is of supreme importance not only to maintain, but to extend; and whereas, securing the independence of such officers from such central control is the only method by which the evil can be remedied: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following amendments to the Constitution be, and are hereby, proposed to the Legislatures of the several States:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. All postmasters, marshals, assessors, and collectors, except collectors of custom duties, shall be chosen for a term of four years at a general election by the electors of the district, city, town, or village in which the duties of their offices are to be performed.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall enact suitable laws to execute the foregoing article, and to insure the faithful discharge of the duties of such officers, and for their removal by the President for official misconduct; and, in case of a removal, for an appointment until the next general election, and for filling vacancies in such offices.

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The Congress shall enact suitable laws for the prevention and punishment of official misconduct and to insure official accountability.

SEC. 2. No person indicted for bribery or for converting the public money, or called as a witness in relation thereto, shall be excused from testifying on the ground that his testimony will tend to criminate himself; and any person convicted of such bribery or conversion shall not be pardoned, and shall be disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M'DONALD.

Mr. BEEBE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3695) granting a pension to James McDonald; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DR. JEREMIAH PHELAN.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE (for Mr. BLISS) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3696) authorizing the President to appoint Dr. Jeremiah Phelan an assistant surgeon in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 122) to amend the resumption act of January 14, 1875; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. HARDENBERGH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3697) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the commissioners of Forest Park, Saint Louis, Missouri, eight condemned cannon to be used in constructing the base of the statue of Ex-Attorney General Edward Bates; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. WILMER.

Mr. HENKLE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3698) for the relief of William R. Wilmer, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELIZA KEARNEY.

Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3699) to increase the pension of Mrs. Eliza Kearney, widow of Lieutenant-Colonel James Kearney, corps of topographical engineers, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ANNE E. HARPER.

Mr. HUNTON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3700) for the relief of Anne E. Harper, of Alexandria County, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOSPITAL STEWARDS.

Mr. FOSTER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3701) to provide for a better compensation and to raise the standard of hospital stewards United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COLLECTION DISTRICT OF THE MIAMI.

Mr. HURD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3702) to change the name of the collection district of the Miami; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SUPREME COURT REPORTS.

Mr. HURD also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 123) directing the Attorney-General to furnish a set of Supreme Court reports to the clerk of the United States district court at Toledo, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 1588 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. DURHAM introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3703) to correct an error in section 1588 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill in full.

Mr. DURHAM. I did not call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for the reading.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky can withdraw the bill if he thinks proper.

Mr. DURHAM. I cannot do that. The bill is a very short one.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and ordered to be printed.

J. D. BOND & BROTHER.

Mr. RIDDLE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3704) for the relief of J. D. Bond & Brother, of Wilson County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ASA FAULKNER.

Mr. DIBRELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3705) for the relief of Asa Faulkner, of Warren County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BULLARD.

Mr. DIBRELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3706) granting relief to William Bullard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. HAYMOND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3707) providing for the gradual resumption of specie payments, and to repeal the portion of section 3 of the act of January 14, 1875, which fixed the date for the resumption of specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER. We want to hear that.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

ENOCH L. FOLSOM.

Mr. HAYMOND also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3708) granting a pension to Enoch L. Folsom, of Lake County, Indiana; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SOLOMON YEWELL.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3709) granting a pension to Solomon Yewell, late private in Company H, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let the bill be read.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARTIN V. DAY.

Mr. HARTZELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3710) granting a pension to Martin V. Day; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A. J. SMITH.

Mr. STONE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3711) to authorize the President of the United States to place the name of A. J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh Cavalry, on the retired list; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to have that bill read.

The bill was read in full, and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STAMPED LETTER AND NOTE SHEET.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3712) to authorize the issue of a stamped letter and note sheet; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let the bill be read.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

MONEYS ERRONEOUSLY CREDITED TO POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3713) to enable the Postmaster-General to place to the credit of the proper account any moneys erroneously deposited to the credit of the Post-Office Department; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I call for the reading of that bill.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

JOHN HOSTAT.

Mr. GLOVER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3714) for the relief of John Hostat, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in full, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT COURT FOR WESTERN ARKANSAS.

Mr. GAUSE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3715) to confer jurisdiction in certain cases on the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER. I call for the reading of that bill.

The bill, having been read in full, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SUSPENDED EMPLOYÉS OF BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. WILLARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3716) for the relief of suspended employés of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, United States Treasury Department; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT.

Mr. POTTER introduced a bill to provide for the cheap transportation of freight between tidewater on or near the Atlantic Ocean and the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER. I call for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Before he had concluded,

Mr. LORD said: I understand that the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has just expired.

Mr. PIPER. Then I call up the unfinished business.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent that the call of the States be completed for bills for reference only, the bills not to be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will be done.

Mr. POPPLETON. I object.

Mr. PIPER. Before calling up my motion to suspend the rules, I will yield for gentlemen who desire to report and introduce bills.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to reserve all points of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The same will be noted.

Mr. ATKINS. To-morrow morning I will move to suspend the rules and that the House shall go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this bill, and shall spend to-morrow in general debate upon it and the next morning that we shall take up the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WALLING. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Tennessee only gives notice that he will make that motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let him move to suspend the rules and make the order now.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not necessary.

Mr. ATKINS. Upon suggestion I will move to suspend the rules so as to make that order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Although there is no impropriety in that course it is certainly not necessary, as the gentleman from Tennessee can make a motion to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to-morrow as well as to-day, and then it will require merely a majority vote, whereas to-day it requires a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent not having been given to the course proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, he now moves to suspend the rules and make the proposed arrangement.

The question was taken, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It does not require a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole; a majority can do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A majority can do it on an appropriation bill, and the Chair will correct it in that regard.

MRS. MARIA B. CRAIG.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3718) for the relief of Mrs. Maria B. Craig; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY A. CHEEVER.

Mr. BANKS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3719) granting a pension to Henry A. Cheever, late first lieutenant and adjutant Seventeenth Massachusetts Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF MOSES COX.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3720) for the relief of the heirs of Moses Cox, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF UNITED STATES STATUTES.

Mr. LYNDE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3721) to amend chapter 304 of the statutes of Congress of 1874; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

JULES BLANCHEZ.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3722) for the relief of Jules Blanchez, late of Brownsville, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAVAGE. I desire to know whether it requires unanimous consent for the introduction of these bills now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does require unanimous consent, and the gentleman from California yields for that purpose.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object to any more bills being introduced in this way.

IMMIGRATION FROM AND EMIGRATION TO CHINA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. PIPER] calls up the unfinished business, which is a motion made on Monday before last to suspend the rules and pass a joint resolution reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to submit to the government of the Ta Tsing Empire (China) an additional article to the treaty of July 28, 1868, between the United States of America and the Ta Tsing Empire (China) to the following effect: The United States of America do hereby reserve the right to regulate, restrict, or prevent the immigration of Chinese subjects into the United States except for commercial pursuits, and reciprocally, the Emperor of China does reserve the right to regulate, restrict, or prevent the immigration of citizens of the United States into the Ta Tsing Empire (China) except for commercial pursuits.

Mr. PIPER. I have moved that the rules be suspended and the joint resolution be passed.

The question was put on the motion to suspend the rules; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. WALLING. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. If no further count is called for, I suppose the joint resolution may be considered as passed by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HURLBUT. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman insists upon a further count it will be taken; otherwise the Chair will declare the joint resolution passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I raise the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has put the question to the House very distinctly. If the gentleman says he made the point of order that no quorum voted the Chair will submit the question to the House again.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I certainly did make the point.

The question was again taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 118, noes 6.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PIPER, and Mr. TOWNSEND of New York, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 126, noes 14.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not call for any further count.

No further count being called for, the rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 124) was passed.

JOHN A. BRIDGELAND.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the evidence taken by the Committee on the Judiciary in an investigation in relation to Horace Boughton be referred, so far as it relates to John A. Bridgeland, at present consul to Havre, France, to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department; and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, to investigate said charges against said Bridgeland, and report thereon to the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. There is a mistake in the wording of the resolution; the testimony was not taken before the Committee on the Judiciary, but before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I will modify the resolution by substituting the "Committee on Military Affairs" for the "Committee on the Judiciary."

Mr. KASSON. What are the charges? I hope consent will be given to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] to state what are the charges. For one, I am ignorant, and I presume we are all ignorant, of what is involved in these charges.

Mr. HURLBUT. If the gentleman will modify the resolution so as to embrace in it and have printed all the testimony taken in that case, I will not object to it.

Mr. BANNING. That is right.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I modify the resolution accordingly.

The question was then taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

JAMES F. BUCKNER.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the rules be suspended so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3486) for the relief of James F. Buckner, and that it be now passed by the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, in the settlement of the accounts of James F. Buckner, collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Kentucky, to credit and allow such amounts as are shown to have been stolen or embezzled by his late deputy collector and cashier, George N. Jackson, it being first proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such embezzlement or larceny did not occur through any fault or negligence of said Buckner: Provided, That the said Buckner shall assign and transfer to the United States, and for their benefit, any bond or other security, lien by judgment, or otherwise, against the said Jackson or others, and the right to prosecute all suit or suits thereon or for the enforcement thereof, and the exclusive benefit of all such shall inure to the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this officer gave an official bond to the Government, and his deputy gave a proper bond to him; and it is now proposed to relieve the collector and throw upon the United States Government the duty of collecting the penalty of the bond given by the person who committed the embezzlement. Now, I submit that if such is the state of facts we are asked to go further in this bill than we have ever gone before in my experience. It is proposing that the United States shall collect this money instead of its being collected by the officer to whom the bond was given.

Mr. TUCKER. My friend is mistaken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is proceeding by unanimous consent only.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest that the report in this case be read.

Mr. TUCKER. I have no objection to the report being read, but I think I can make a statement in a few minutes that will answer every purpose. I ask consent for that purpose.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. TUCKER. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means and as chairman of the subcommittee I have examined this case with very great care. I think my colleague upon that committee will agree that I am not apt to report in favor of the release of any party from his legal liabilities, unless the circumstances are very strongly in favor of such a proposition. After a very careful and full examination of the case I am satisfied that this relief ought to be given to this party.

He is a collector in a district, the fifth district of the State of Kentucky, in which about $2,000,000 are usually collected every year. By law he is required to appoint his deputies, one of whom acts as cashier. He appointed as his cashier and deputy a young man from the city of Louisville, of the very highest character for integrity and honesty, according to the evidence in the case. When this young man entered upon the office, the collector required him to deposit in bank to the credit of the collector all the moneys received during each day, so that no money was left on hand. The collector took a bond from this deputy in the penalty of $25,000, which was more than the penalty required of any party in the same office at any previous time, Collector Buckner increasing the penalty from $15,000 to $25,000, in order to obtain the better security. The young man by a series of frauds, very well concealed, perpetrated these peculations upon the Government in reference to the stamps which were in his possession; so that the defalcation amounted to something like $60,000. Six detectives were sent out at different times to examine the office of Mr. Buckner; and upon each examination they reported everything right in the office of this young man. These reports are filed with the evidence before the committee.

As soon as the frauds were detected the young man committed suicide, destroying—as was supposed—the papers and books by which it would have been ascertained how the fraud was committed. The effect is that this man, Mr. Buckner, with his securities, is held liable for the defalcation.

The committee in examining this case took the ground that there should be no relaxation of the liability of the party unless these four points were made out:

1. The whole burden of proof rests with the officer.

2. He must exclude all hypothesis of fraud on his part or privity in or knowledge of the misconduct of his subordinate.

3. He must show due, that is, watchful, care and diligence in the appointment and over the action of his subordinate.

4. He must show that he used all reasonable care in providing for responsibility of the subordinate for any malfeasance or negligence in office.

Now the committee, upon an examination of all the evidence, held that those four points were conclusively made out; that in all respects there was an entire exclusion of all privity or knowledge on the part of the collector of any fraudulent act of his subordinate; that the frauds of the latter were so well concealed from him and from these six detectives that it was well-nigh impossible for Mr. Buckner ever to have found them out.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Let me state one other fact. Within two weeks of the discovery of the defalcation did not an officer of the Government, a trained expert, whose special business it was to investigate the business of such offices, go thoroughly through this one and report its accounts all accurate and all its affairs in every respect faultless?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir; Mr. Wheeler, on the 25th of June, 1875, made such a report to the Government. Thus Mr. Buckner was lulled into entire security as to the whole matter, because, when the detectives at various times examined and reported to the Government and to Mr. Buckner that upon a thorough examination the matter was all right, Mr. Buckner was justified in assuming that he was not required to make any further examination.

Mr. EDEN. How long were these frauds going on?

Mr. TUCKER. For two or three years, I think, and during the whole time there were six examinations by officers of the Government: in November, 1872; in April, 1873; in February, 1874; in November, 1874; in March, 1875; and in June, 1875.

Mr. EDEN. Is it known how the frauds occurred?

Mr. TUCKER. It is impossible, as the detectives say, to ascertain exactly how the frauds occurred; but it is supposed that the fraud was in the miscount of stamps; that the amount of stamps on hand was concealed or in some other way deception was practiced. The evidence does not show the manner in which the fraud occurred.

I am opposed to releasing public officers except where the case is a clear one; but the House will permit me to read a single passage from the report which states what seems to me to be the ground upon which there ought to be a release in such cases:

> Your committee would not relax the responsibility of a collector for his own or the defaults of his subordinates as fixed by law, except where it is clearly established by affirmative proof that the collector has not only had no complicity with the wrongful act, but where he has used due diligence in the selection of his agent, in supervising his conduct, and in guarding the Government and public against the consequences of his malfeasance. Where this is fully shown, and all guilty knowledge and improper negligence in respect to the acts of the subordinates are excluded by clear proof, your committee are of opinion that justice, sustained by numerous precedents, requires that the legal liability of the collector may be properly released by the Government.
> The collector is the agent of the Government, an agent whose duties are such as to authorize him to employ subagents; in fact, the law expressly authorizes it. To hold the collector to responsibility for a lack of infallibility in the selection and in the supervision and guarding of these subagents, so that the Government shall be absolutely secured against loss, would be to make the collector not a mere bailee but an insurer for the Government. Such a measure of liability would be fraught with public detriment, because it would deter upright men from undertaking official duty which involved such hazard, and leave the offices to be filled by irresponsible men. It is the interest of the Government to induce honest men to take office, and not frighten them from it by the exaction of a liability too great to be willingly incurred.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Under the law the collector, I believe, determines what shall be the character of the security given to him by his subordinates.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. He determines what shall be the form of the bond, who the sureties shall be, and what shall be the penalty. This whole matter is by the law placed exclusively under the control of the collector. In this case he fixed the penalty of the bond of his subordinate at $25,000. Now, what steps have been taken by the collector to enforce the penalty of that bond?

Mr. TUCKER. I am coming to that in a moment. The only doubt I had about this case was on just that point, whether the collector had used due diligence in fixing the proper penalty for the bond. The proof is that previously the penalty in the bond of this officer was $10,000, which was afterward increased to $15,000; but when Buckner came in, he required a bond to be given in the penalty of $25,000, one-fourth the penalty of his own bond. It seemed to me, therefore, that he had used due diligence in fixing a proper penalty, because it cannot be said that if a proper penalty had been fixed there would have been no loss. Why, sir, $2,000,000 were collected every year by this collector; and in order to cover all possible liability the bond must have been in the penalty of $2,000,000. Who could have given such a bond? The clerk who gets $1,500 salary? So that, as I say, and as the report states, we must be careful not to put such limitations and restrictions upon the officers as that no honest man would take the office. Now I admit that you must hold a fiduciary to strict liability, but you must take care not to deter honest men from becoming fiduciaries, and you must not hold them to such strict liability as that a man would say, "Why, if this man whom I have appointed to office steals a sum of money to-night without my knowing anything about it, and I am to be held liable, I would not accept the office."

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I understand the gentleman to say that the object of the Government should be to get honest men to take office. Should it not be the part of the Government to get competent men to take office?

Mr. TUCKER. Unquestionably.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Do you consider a man competent who allows such a fraud to pass without his notice?

Mr. TUCKER. The question is whether you shall require or can have a competency which involves infallibility. That is the question. And as my friend from Indiana in common with all human beings is fallible, I suppose that he ought not to be excluded from office on account of that fallibility which is common to our race.

Mr. EDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. EDEN. Does the committee consider it would be a safe precedent to say that any public officer who appoints his own subordinates should not be responsible for the acts of those subordinates?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes; under the circumstances of this case and under the limitations stated by the committee.

But I will state to the House, Mr. Speaker, that I was careful, and I think my friends on the committee will agree with me that I was careful, so to limit the cases in which a party will be exempted from liability as that this cannot be drawn into an evil precedent for any future action.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this a unanimous report by the committee?

Mr. TUCKER. It is not a unanimous report.

Mr. LORD. I find that this matter is going into a general debate, and I feel constrained to call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This debate is going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. TUCKER. If my friend from New York [Mr. LORD] will allow me two minutes, I desire to answer the question of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] inquired if this is a unanimous report. I think I ought in justice to myself to say that I did not concur in it. This man is entitled to my sympathies, but he assumed the responsibilities of this office and he ought, in my judgment, to incur the loss.

Mr. TUCKER. I stated that it was not a unanimous report.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to say that I have given, myself, considerable attention to this case, and I regard it as one coming within the conditions heretofore required and for which there are numerous precedents.

Mr. TUCKER. I will answer the question of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The gentleman asks me what steps have been taken by this party to recover on the penal bond given by the deputy. Steps were immediately taken; suit was immediately brought. The sureties on the bond were worth eight times the amount of the penalty at the time the bond was given, and up to the time of the death of the party and the time the suit was brought. That question was very earnestly inquired into by me as a member of the committee. The suit was brought, and is now pending; and my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is mistaken in supposing that it is proposed to hand over to the Government the duty of bringing this suit. The only thing we propose is that the collector be exempted from liability, but shall assign to the Government all the benefit of this bond which he has taken and all the benefits of any lien which he may obtain by judgment or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. But would it not be safer at any rate for the collector to pay over the amount which is so amply secured according to the statement of my friend from Virginia? Let him pay over that amount, at least, rather than devolve upon the Government the prosecution of the suit.

And there is one other question which I am very anxious to have presented, and to which I desire an answer from the Committee of Ways and Means, as being of importance in this case. I understand the law to be this: In such a case, on the recommendation of the judge trying the case and the district attorney, after the facts have been all judicially investigated, the Treasury Department is authorized to remit the liability of the officer, to remit the penalty of the bond, and relieve the collector from the responsibility. Is not that the law?

Mr. TUCKER. I think not. I hope that is not the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then, if it is not the law, how does it happen that the Treasury Department is authorized to compromise the case after judgment is rendered, on the recommendation of the district attorney and the judge before whom the case is tried?

Mr. TUCKER. I do not know of any such law. That is not proposed here at all. Buckner has no funds to pay over to the Government. He would be very glad if he had. He has brought suit against the deputy collector's sureties, and the bill proposes that he shall assign over to the Government the benefit of any judgment that may accrue under that suit.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it would be safer to let this case rest until after the case has been tried, and then we shall know by a judicial examination of the case exactly how far this collector was responsible for the defalcation.

Mr. TUCKER. The difficulty is that if this measure is not adopted the property of Buckner will be exposed for sale for this defalcation, and that will ruin the party, and this bill is proposed by the committee in order to save this man from utter ruin. We think that he should be exempted from all liability in this case, and he assigns over to the Government the benefit of all the securities he has, and the Government is not authorized to relieve him from liability until these securities are assigned.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the release of this principal necessarily result in releasing the sureties of the deputy?

Mr. TUCKER. O, no; not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, certainly it will; certainly my friend is mistaken about that.

Mr. TUCKER. Why, my friend from Indiana is certainly too learned a lawyer not to know that the release of Buckner by the United States on the official bond of Buckner to the United States cannot affect the liability of the sureties on a private bond to Buckner. The bill saves the interest of the Government in that bond, and I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to pass it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. If Buckner be relieved, how can you enforce any penalty against his deputy?

Mr. TUCKER. Well, sir, a suit against Buckner would be a suit by the United States against Buckner, while his suit is a suit against the sureties of his deputy.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Buckner, unless he is damnified, cannot in that suit recover damages, and the sureties of his deputy will be relieved.

Mr. TUCKER. O, no; not at all. If the Government allows him to assign this case, it does not release the depnty or his sureties at all.

Mr. HANCOCK. The assignment is one of the conditions of release.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to say that few measures have been before the Committee of Ways and Means which have been so carefully examined as this case, and I am satisfied that every statement made by the gentleman from Virginia will bear the fullest scrutiny. I am equally satisfied that the eqnity of the case requires the passage of the bill, and its passage now.

Mr. TUCKER. If gentlemen have no further qnestions to ask me I will call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the motion is not snbject to the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask leave to submit a single remark as to the policy to be pursued in this particular case, for I am satisfied that this bill is carrying the relief which Congress has occasionally granted to persons connected with a defalcation to a degree that no relief has ever been granted for until 1864.

I do not believe that a bill beginning to approach this in its character and furnishing such relief ever passed this House; I am not aware at least of any such measure giving relief to this extent having passed the House prior to that time. Since that time I admit that we have grown very loose in this kind of legislation, in furnishing this relief to the extent, it seems to me, of encouraging rather than preventing defalcation.

But in this particular case, if the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, there will be a judicial investigation in a short time. We are told that a suit is to be brought at once on the bonds given by this deputy, and that the penalty of that bond is amply secured to the amount of $25,000. It will be tried at an early day and the trial will inevitably involve the whole question of defalcation. There will be a recovery of judgment there if the facts are as my friend understands them to be, and the amount of that penalty will be the recovery. The House can then move with a reasonable certainty. There will have been a judicial investigation. There will have been collected $25,000 of this money, and we can then proceed with a reasonable certainty on two points; first, it can be assured that the judicial tribunal will determine with a reasonable certainty whether the defalcation could have come to the knowledge of the principal or not; and secondly, whether the money should go into the Treasury of the United States. While both these matters remain an uncertainty and until the suit is determined, delay can do no harm, for the Treasury Department, in the case put, will not be in haste to determine the suit against his sureties.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Upon that point I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if the report of the committee of this House specially charged with the investigation of the merits of the case should not be accepted as more satisfactory than any opinion of the judge who may hereafter try the case?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, not at all.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. As I understand, this case has had a most exhaustive and thorough investigation by the commttee on all points presented by the claimant and that the proof is overwhelming in his favor.

Let me add, Mr. Speaker, that the claimant here is not of my political faith—but a consistent, determined republican, of great influence, but unspotted character. James F. Buckner is honest and incorruptible. Since this great misfortune he has been continued in office, retaining fully the confidence of the officers of the Government and of his fellow-citizens at home. He renewed his bond, at once and without difficulty, in the same community where the defalcation occurred; and there, with those who know him best, there exists no shadow of suspicion of any misconduct on his part.

There is a memorial here recommending his relief, signed by hundreds of the leading citizens of Kentucky—lawyers, bankers, editors, doctors, and merchants—most of them living in his city, and, indeed, most of them not of his political party. The bill should pass. A case of more merit could not be made out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have had some experience, as my friend from Kentucky has, in congressional investigations. They are from the necessities of the case partial, for from the necessities of the case the testimony is ex parte.

Mr. TUCKER. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. From the necessity of the case the testimony is ex parte; it is impossible that there should be a judicial investigation of any question before a committee of Congress. Now in the mean time there will be a judicial investigation; the real facts will come out under the severe tests which a court of justice applies, and we can then act with absolute safety; until then we cannot.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. For the information of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I will ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] if during the progress of this investigation, wherever a doubt suggested itself to the mind of the committee, they did not require additional proof on that point?

Mr. TUCKER. All the way through.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. And was not the proof on all those doubtful points most abundant and satisfactory?

Mr. TUCKER. There is no question about that. The proof of Mr. Buckner's honesty and honor and non-privity in this matter is absolutely positive. And furthermore, in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN,] I will say that whenever any doubt suggested itself to my mind I required additional proof, and I obtained it from such sources as left no doubt upon my mind. When the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says that the evidence in this case must have been ex parte, I will say to him that the committee heard that there were persons in this city who had evidence against Buckner, and we suspended the examination and examined those persons fully before the committee, and there was nothing proved by all of the parties brought here that threw the slightest shade upon the conduct or character of Mr. Buckner.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] if this case was before his committee in the last Congress; and, if so, why that committee did not then report in favor of it?

Mr. FOSTER. It was not before our committee in the last Congress.

Mr. TUCKER. I now call for a vote.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 118, noes 32.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

ELECTIONS IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. WIGGINTON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 3101 a bill (H. R. No. 3723) to regulate elections and the election franchise in the Territories of the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

PAYMENT OF 5.20 BONDS IN COIN.

Mr. POPPLETON. I move that the rules be suspended so that the House may now adopt the preamble and resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has been publicly charged that the act passed March 18, 1869, promising to pay the principal of the 5.20 bonds of the Government in coin was procured through fraud, by the use of large sums of money used to elect and corrupt public officials and influence the public press, said money having been obtained through the combined efforts of certain banks, bankers, and moneyed corporations in this country and the moneyed centers of London and Frankfort in Europe, by the purchase on account, and for that purpose, of $50,000,000 of said bonds, on which 10 per cent. advance was paid to procure said legislation, the total amount of which was at least $5,000,000, that being the sum alleged as having been paid to secure the passage of said act; and whereas it is held and alleged—

First. That the effect of said legislation has been to compel the payment of twice the amount in coin for all of said bonds already redeemed as was received in coin or its equivalent by the Government for said bonds when issued, owing to the statute under which they were created promising their payment in lawful money.

Second. To continue the payment of usurious interest on said bonds for more than seven years after the Government had the right to redeem them in lawful money, whereby over $500,000,000 have been unjustly wrung from the people.

Third. To force a large majority of said bonds out of the country and into the hands of foreigners to whom said interest is paid, which, had just and honest legislation prevailed, would have been reduced to a reasonable rate and paid to our own people in lawful money, and retained within the country to develop its resources.

Fourth. To create a demand for gold in excess of the production of our mines, to pay the interest on said bonds held in foreign countries, thereby depleting this country of that commodity.

Fifth. To bring the corrupting influence of foreign capital to bear upon our elections, public officials, and the press, the result of all of which, it is charged, has been to enrich the few at the expense of the many, to paralyze business, exhaust the resources and impair the confidence of the people, and to bring public officials into general distrust: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the truth or falsity of said charges and allegations, and, if found true, whether said corrupt action does not invalidate said law, and also whether said law was not in violation of the contract under which said bonds were originally issued, and for that reason unconstitutional and void.

Resolved, That said committee have power to send for and examine persons and papers, either of the Government or any firm or corporation having business connected with the purchase or sale of Government bonds when said act was passed, to administer oaths, punish witnesses, and to do all things necessary to obtain correct and truthful information relating to all matters referred to in this preamble and these resolutions, and to report the result of its investigations and conclusions to this House at its earliest convenience.

Before the reading had been concluded,

Mr. KASSON said: I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. KASSON. I raise this point of order as against the motion which is now made to the House to suspend the rules and pass the preamble and resolutions being read by the Clerk; it is that House bill No. 2685, for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, was made a special order for Monday to the exclusion of all other orders, and to the exclusion of all motions to suspend the rules from and after two o'clock p. m. That bill is now in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The pending proposition is one to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order of the House relating to that bill, or that portion of the order in regard to a suspension of the rules, exhausted itself on Monday last.

Mr. KASSON. On the contrary, it was made a special order from day to day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The consideration of the bill proceeds from day to day.

Mr. KASSON. And on Mondays excluding all motions to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not "on Mondays." The Chair has had his attention called to the matter; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] will be recognized directly to make a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of that bill.

Mr. KASSON. The Calendar sets it down as an order for to-day, whatever that may be worth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not responsible for the Calendar, only for the enforcement of the rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. I can refer the gentleman in the RECORD to the proceedings of last Saturday week, when that order was made.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the preamble and resolution.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman who offers this resolution expect us to indorse all those recitals without the examination of a committee?

Mr. POPPLETON. I do ask the House to indorse those recitals as having been alleged against the legislation of 1869; alleged in the public press and by responsible parties.

Mr. HOLMAN. Every fact asserted there has been alleged here on the floor of the House.

Mr. POPPLETON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the preamble and resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 21, not voting 166; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cason, Cate, John B. No quorum voted.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. TUCKER. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BURCHARD, who, if present would vote in the negative, while I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MACDOUGALL. I do not know how he would vote if he were present; I presume he would not vote at all. I would vote "ay."

Mr. VAN VORHES. My colleague from Ohio, Mr. VANCE, is absent by order of the House.

Mr. MORGAN. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. PLATT. If he were present I should vote "ay."

Mr. AINSWORTH. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MILLER. If he were present he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated—no quorum voting.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. POPPLETON. I move a call of the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Has the Chair announced the decision of the question on the call of the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, there is no decision.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the House adjourn; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask unanimous consent to make a report at this time from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

Mr. O'NEILL. I yield to my colleague for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion to adjourn, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] asks unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

Mr. POPPLETON. I have no objection, provided the motion made by myself does not lose its proper standing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's motion for a call of the House is still pending and will be taken up when the motion to adjourn is disposed of. The Chair hears no objection to allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania to submit his report.

THE CHARGE AGAINST THE SPEAKER.

Mr. CLYMER. I am directed by the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department to submit the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, after full investigation into the charges made against Hon. M. C. KERR, to the effect that the said KERR, while a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States, in 1866, had nominated one Augustus P. Greene, of New York, to an appointment in the regular Army of the United States, and in consideration of such appointment had received the sum of $450, would submit that, upon a thorough inquiry into the facts, after full examination of Lawrence Harney, (the only witness making the charge,) also of Augustus P. Greene and divers other witnesses, it appears that in 1866, while he was a member of the House of Representatives in the Thirty-ninth Congress, Mr. KERR did, in the exercise of his right or privilege as such Representative, nominate the said Augustus P. Greene for an appointment in the regular Army; that such nomination was made upon the application of said Greene, several Representatives from New York, including the member from his own district, being unable to present his name by reason of their engagements in that regard to other persons desirous of securing such appointment; that said Greene was furnished with and showed to Mr. KERR letters of commendation and indorsement from many worthy and prominent citizens of New York, together with letters of indorsement from divers officers of the United States Army; that additional indorsements from parties in New York with whom he was personally acquainted were required by Mr. KERR; that such additional vouchers of Greene's worth and fitness were secured and presented; that Hon. Morgan Jones, at that time a member of Congress from New York, made application in person to Mr. KERR, soliciting at his hands the appointment of Greene; that no application for the place had been or ever was made to Mr. KERR by any citizen or resident of his own district; that the time within which such right of appointment could be exercised was about to expire; that the appointment had been tendered by Mr. KERR to several of his constituency—at least two—and by each of these gentlemen it had been declined. It was under these circumstances that Mr. KERR conferred upon Greene the nomination for an appointment in the regular Army, which, after examination before the proper board, was given him; and your committee most emphatically declare their conviction of the perfect and absolute propriety of the action taken by Mr. KERR in the premises. It does appear from the testimony that the money, $450, was paid by Greene to Lawrence Harney upon assurance given by Harney that for the sum of $500 he (Harney) could secure the appointment; that Harney did receive the money from Greene and reported to him that he had paid the same to Mr. KERR.

This statement stands alone and unsupported. From the testimony of Greene it appears that he knows nothing of the transaction beyond the payment of the money by him to Harney. From the whole of the testimony, in the face of other and conflicting statements made by Harney to divers persons in relation to the transaction, coupled with the counter-statements of other witnesses and the circumstances attending the transaction, your committee have found no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the charge, as made by Harney as to the payment of the amount of money stated or any other sum to Mr. KERR, for the object and purpose named, is unqualifiedly false; that Mr. KERR stands fully exonerated from all implication in anywise affecting his personal honor or official integrity. Your committee find nothing throughout the whole progress of this investigation to impair or detract from the well-established reputation that he enjoys for unquestioned personal integrity and unsullied purity of official record. All of which, together with the testimony taken, is herewith respectfully submitted as the unanimous action of all the members present.

HIESTER CLYMER.
WM. M. ROBBINS.
JO. C. S. BLACKBURN.
L. DANFORD.

Mr. CLYMER. It is my great pleasure to believe that the report just read records not only the unanimous judgment of the members of this House, but that also of the whole people of the country. As such, sir, I leave it without further comment, simply asking that it and the accompanying evidence may be printed. If there are others who desire to be heard on the report, I will be happy to give them an opportunity. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD.]

Mr. DANFORD. It affords me real pleasure to be able to subscribe to the report just read at the Clerk's desk, and I desire at the outset to say that I do it not because of the unfortunate illness of Mr. KERR, but I do it because it is an act of simple justice to the man.

I desire to call the attention of the House for a few minutes to what I deem were some of the unfortunate circumstances that surrounded Mr. KERR in connection with the charge of the witness Harney. The committee were met at the very threshold of this investigation with a somewhat singular fact. Mr. KERR, a resident of the State of Indiana, had conferred a valuable appointment, perhaps fully as valuable as any appointment he had the privilege of controlling during that Congress, upon a resident of the State of New York. Mr. KERR, a democratic member of this House, conferred an appointment on a republican, a man with whom—as his testimony shows—he had no previous acquaintance, and a man that had no acquaintance in his district.

These were the unfortunate circumstances that surrounded him at the very outset of this investigation; and I will announce here for myself, and I believe for the entire committee, that had it not been for these unfortunate circumstances the committee would not have deemed it worth while to even enter upon the investigation.

The witness Harney, when he came before the committee, told a connected story, and one that in a cross-examination of four or five hours he in the main sustained, and which the House will see that he had very little difficulty in sustaining. In the main he was telling the truth; and in that constituted the danger to Mr. KERR. It was true, as he stated, that Greene had been appointed on Mr. KERR's recommendation; and it was undoubtedly true, as he testified, as Greene also testified, that Mr. KERR's first acquaintance with Greene was upon the introduction of this man Harney. The appointment was made, and for ten years I presume that Mr. KERR had thought but little of it. The circumstance had almost passed out of his mind, and when, some time in April last, he received through an anonymous letter notice that a report was being quietly circulated about the city of New York that he had been corrupted in the appointment of Greene, he naturally became anxious about the report. The committee met the fact of his anxiety also upon the very threshold of this examination. They found that the personal friends of the Speaker had visited Harney as well as Greene.

These were the circumstances under which we put Harney upon the stand as a witness. I will not speak here of the testimony of Greene, for I believe that the committee are thoroughly satisfied that, to the best of his recollection, he swore entirely to the truth. When this report, however, was being circulated, and when it came to the knowledge of Mr. KERR, he endeavored to find out the author of the anonymous letter. Knowing, as he did, the circumstances of Greene's appointment, and although at the first blush it might seem rather an unnatural circumstance that a man occupying the position of Speaker of this House should go to work through his personal friends and through an attorney to hunt down the author of an anonymous letter, yet when we come to consider the feeble condition of the man, when we come to consider the toils with which by circumstances he was surrounded, his action was natural and was just what any man under the circumstances should have done.

Harney, as I have said, had but one falsehood to tell, and in that I repeat consisted the danger of this story. The falsehood was in saying that he had handed the amount he had undoubtedly received from Greene to Mr. KERR; and this was the only circumstance and the only fact that in any way affected the honor or the integrity of Mr. KERR. Sir, there have been some charges made, and I desire in this connection to refer to the testimony of the witness Mr. Joseph S. Moore, that this charge against Mr. KERR had grown out of some conspiracy hatched in the city of New York, corruptly hatched for the purpose of breaking down the reputation and character of the Speaker of this House. I want to address myself to this matter as contained in the testimony of Mr. Moore. I do not and shall not refer to any newspaper articles upon the subject, but only to the testimony of Moore. After having visited the Speaker, and after having learned the circumstances of the case, he returned to the city of New York, and after an interview with Harney he wrote a letter to the Speaker, in which he characterized this as a conspiracy; and when the Speaker came first before the committee and gave his informal statement and denial, he spoke of the matter as a conspiracy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, upon that point I have but a word or two to say. This story of Harney's was no new invention. He told it ten years ago to Greene; and the evidence of a conspiracy is contained wholly and entirely in the testimony of the witness Harney. Moore based the facts upon which he based this charge of conspiracy upon what Harney had said to him. Moore testifies that when he first went to see Harney, Harney told him that he was pressed to make this statement. He tells him likewise that his lips were sealed, and that if he desired to know anything more of the charge he must go to see his lawyer, Judge Dittenhoffer. I believe we have the testimony of Moore as to the fact of his strange conduct upon that occasion; but the House will take notice that all this testimony is the testimony of Harney alone. Moore testifies that Harney had said to him on one occasion that Darling and Bliss and Davenport were insisting on his coming before the committee of the House and revealing this secret; but it will be remembered that Harney, on the witness-stand, denied having made any such declaration to Moore or any one else; and whether he did so or not, I am authorized to say here that as far as these gentlemen are concerned it is wholly and entirely untrue as to any corrupt motives or any conspiracy. Then there is no testimony save the testimony of Harney himself, a witness whom we discredit in our report, a witness who has gotten up this falsehood, a witness who has, as we believe and say virtually in the report, perjured himself on the witness-stand in the attempt to fasten this stain on Mr. KERR; he is the only and solitary witness testifying to any fact or circumstance brought to the attention of the committee that looked to any one else having had a hand in this transaction but himself.

I believe that this statement came from Harney in a very natural way. As I remarked a moment ago, it is the story he told ten years ago to Greene. Greene himself testifies that Harney stated that he paid the money to Mr. KERR, and he testified before the committee that during the winter, while the press was, perhaps, to use his own expression, "pitching into his employer" while these investigations were going on which the House and the country have been full of for the last six months, and while he was under some excitement in relation to this transaction, he told the story he had told ten years ago to Greene, told it to Darling, and Darling told it to Bliss, and Bliss told the story, as he testified before a committee of the House, in New York some weeks ago to a member of this committee.

I say, then, that the manner in which this charge came out from Harney was a perfectly natural course. He was only following up the story he had told to Greene ten years ago. When it was told to these gentlemen, with the knowledge they had of the circumstances which surround the case which I have already detailed, they gave it naturally to the committee, and the committee have acted upon it, and acted in good faith.

Now, a word just here in relation to Harney's testimony itself. As I have said, he told a story that in the main was consistent with itself; but fortunately for Mr. KERR we have been able by the testimony of a number of witnesses to contradict him in some matters testified to by him more or less material.

In the first place, he was contradicted in the testimony of the witness Moore, to which I have already referred. He was contradicted in his statement that he had never talked in relation to this matter to any other persons than Mr. Darling; he was contradicted by the testimony of Mr. Shanks, a material and important witness, whose testimony was taken last Saturday, and who testified that he visited Harney and talked with him in relation to this charge, and that Harney said to him in reply to his question that he had never said that there was any money transaction between him and Mr. KERR, but that it was only the social relations that he referred to. Harney in his testimony on the witness-stand denied having ever talked to a newspaper reporter on this subject or in that direction to any one. He denied that he had ever applied to any member of Congress to appoint Mr. Greene because of any benefit that might accrue to him out of it. That was his testimony as given on the stand. One witness, Morgan Jones, testified that while a member of the same Congress Harney approached him in the interest of Greene, asking his appointment, and saying that if it could be made it would be to his advantage, and he would have a nice present for the appointment. We have also the testimony of Meyer Strouse, also a member of the same Congress, who testified, by the way, that he was on intimate and familiar terms with the witness Harney; that Harney had applied to him for the appointment of Greene, saying that he might thereby make three or four hundred dollars. We have these contradictions of Harney on these material matters testified to by him.

There is another matter that Harney had taken care to notice. He was cross-examined in relation to the rooms occupied by Mr. KERR during that session, and he was able in some way to give such a statement to the committee of the location and situation of the rooms occupied by Mr. KERR at that time as that he was not contradicted. I have not been able to satisfy my mind as to whether it is not true as he testified that he had accompanied Greene to the rooms of Mr. KERR, although Greene testified positively that no such thing occurred, and Speaker KERR is very confident and clear in his recollection also in the same direction. Harney was, however, fortified upon that, and on cross-examination his story was not disproved. I am happy, however, to say that in the contradictions of Harney in his manner before the committee the committee were satisfied that he was not testifying to the truth. I have felt it my duty to say this as a member of the committee, having met this witness face to face, and it is a fact well known to every lawyer present at least, that it is half the question as to the value of a witness's testimony whether you can have him confront the jury or not. He was present and testified to the committee, and I am happy to say that notwithstanding all these circumstances which I have detailed I have no idea that so far as the corruption of Mr. KERR is concerned there was one single scintilla of truth in his testimoey. But it was a falsehood, taken advantage of by a bad man for the purpose of blackening, or attempting to blacken, the reputation of a good man. [Applause.]

Just here let me say one word, and the House will pardon me for saying it, in connection with investigations by committees of Congress and the manner in which they are conducted. An investigation by a committee of Congress may be an instrument of great good in remedying evils that have crept into the public service, and likewise may result in great public benefit by unearthing villainies and scoundrelism generally. But when such investigations are made use of by a bad man like Harney for the purpose of blackening the reputation of an honored and esteemed citizen, they become the very worst instruments that can be used in a country like ours. The testimony of Harney, his appearance before one of our committees as a witness, in my judgment was the natural outgrowth of the investigations which have been conducted by some of the committees of this House during the last six months.

We have seen such committees, composed either of entire standing committees or of subcommittees, mousing around and dragging to public view the private correspondence of citizens, publishing the bank accounts of public men, without charges and without specification against them. I have thought at times, during the present session of this Congress, that in some quarters there was an evident feeling of gratification when a public official could be smirched. I remember reading some two months ago the head-lines in a newspaper, in which it was announced that "Grant is caught at last," followed by a dispatch actually rejoicing at the prospect that the President of the United States had been found, as they announced, concerned in some questionable transaction, referring in that case to the expenditure of money in connection with the New York election frauds—the President of the United States, whom we should all honor and respect for the position he occupies, a great soldier who led our armies from Donelson to Appomattox, from victory to final triumph, who is now in the last year of his second term as President of the United States, the successor of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln. Sir, it is a sad spectacle when any committee of the House of Representatives, or any citizen of this country, can express gratification at the mere idea of connecting the President of the United States with any questionable transaction.

I remember another committee of this House that brought a certain witness here to testify against the President of the United States in regard to the breaking up of the marital relations of that witness by the President. He came before that committee without one corroborating circumstance, without a single fact to support the testimony he was about to give. Yet, in the hope that the public character and reputation of the President might be blasted or smirched forever, it might be his family relations broken up, a committee of this Congress felt called upon to bring before them this witness and examine him upon the subject, until they found he was a lunatic.

I have in my mind at this time a committee of this House that by the process of an officer of this House has gone to the office of one of the telegraph companies of the country and seized I do not know how many hundred pounds of telegraphic messages, indiscriminate, from citizens of all classes, in relation to private and public affairs alike, to be moused through and searched over by a committee of the House of Representatives.

I ask is it wonderful that such conduct, such operations as these, should beget an occasional Harney in the way perhaps of retaliation? I believe the man was corrupt, that he was bad, and I say from my heart that I believe such men as he are the worst class of men that can be found in our country.

I am happy to say, after going through all this testimony, after hearing the clear statement of Mr. KERR, after he gave to the committee his satisfactory explanation of the appointment of Greene, that he had no applicants from his own district, that he offered it to two personal friends who declined, that the time for the appointment was drawing to a close, that he made the appointment he did upon the application of his colleagues upon the floor of this House—I am happy to say that we all think the testimony is clear and conclusive as to the entire innocence and integrity of Mr. KERR in this matter.

There is another thing, however, that weighs in my mind more than all these circumstances; that is, a good name, a name that he has borne in this Congress without reproach for many sessions. Has it come to this, that a man's good name shall count for nothing in tais country? Our strength as a people, the perpetuity of our institutions depend upon the character of the good men that we have produced. I should be loath to believe that any man occupying the high position that Mr. KERR occupies to-day before the country could be found guilty of any transaction like the one charged in this case.

I hope that the vote in favor of this report will be the unanimous vote of this House, without one dissentient voice, that every gentleman upon this floor who knows the Speaker of this House as we all know him will join in wiping out this attempted stain upon his character and reputation. I trust that by our action here to-day we will enter our protest against this wholesale slander of public men, and enable Mr. KERR to present to his countrymen, to this House, that has elevated him to the third highest position in our Government, a character that will enable him to say to every one hereafter, "My fame is as white as it was before the breath of this scandal touched it." It is our duty to him, as a just and upright man, to adopt this report without a single dissenting voice, so that he may be hereafter, as he has been in the past, an honor to his country, a tower of strength to his colleagues upon this floor, and a comfort and consolation and pride to his wife and children. Mr. Speaker, I now ask the adoption of this report.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not desire to say a word on this subject, but only to afford to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD,] the opportunity to say that which I am satisfied he has only failed to say by inadvertence. In reference to the fact that Greene, of New York, the appointee in question, was a republican—one of the circumstances which tended to give color to the charge against Mr. KERR. I only desire that my colleague on the committee might add, as part of his own utterance, that it appears in testimony that two men—one named Jackson, mentioned by the Speaker in his evidence before the committee, and the other Williams, communicating with us by letter from Princeton, Indiana—both had the appointment tendered to them by Mr. KERR, and both declined. They were both then republicans, and one at least is now.

Mr. DANFORD. Certainly, that is true; and while Greene was a republican, several members from New York—Mr. JONES and one or two others—who applied to Mr. KERR for the appointment of Greene were democrats. The testimony likewise shows that Greene brought to him recommendations from prominent citizens of the city and State of New York without regard to party.

Mr. CLYMER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, the reputation of our public men is among the best riches of the country, and the man or men who would unjustly and untruly detract from the reputation of any public man not only directs a stab at the character of the person attacked, but is doing the utmost mischief to the fair fame and success of the nation.

I did not wait for this report. With me the long record of an honorable life outweighs and has outweighed all these loose defamers that this baser time encourages upon the track of detraction and scandal. I only rise on this occasion to express by my voice, and by my vote which is to come, the idea that for one, as an American Representative, having before my eyes the honor of the people and the honor of this House which is the honor of the people, I am glad here to be able from the heart to say that, whatever shadow this momentary imputation may have cast upon the days of the distinguished Speaker of this House, days which some of us fear are numbered already, yet let it go forth by the unanimous voice of the people through their Representatives that the ægis of a long and honorable life has protected him from the envenomed shaft of malice; that the cloud is removed; and that if his sun goes down, it shall go down in full honor and esteem from all honorable men of whatever party. [General applause.]

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the previous question on the adoption of this report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the question on the adoption of the report be taken by a rising vote.

Mr. CLYMER. I hope that will be done.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will be adopted.

The affirmative vote being called for, all the members present rose.

Mr. BANKS. Let there be a count; it makes a record.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that it be entered on the record that the report was unanimously adopted.

Mr. MILLIKEN. By a rising vote.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I move that the count be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless there be objection that will be done, and the record suggested by the gentleman from Ohio will be entered.

Mr. BANKS. There should be a count of the votes; it makes a record.

The negative vote having been called for and no member rising, the result was announced—ayes 210, noes none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report is adopted by a unanimous vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew my request that it be recorded that the report was adopted unanimously by a rising vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be so recorded.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask that the report and the accompanying testimony be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it would be highly proper that this House should furnish to Mr. KERR in the most formal manner a certified copy of our proceedings on this occasion. I move that such copy be furnished to him by the Clerk of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves that the Clerk of this House furnish the Speaker of the House in the most formal way a certification of the proceedings on the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. The Chair bears no objection, and that order is made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] that the House adjourn. Does he withdraw it?

Mr. O'NEILL. I agreed to yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] who desires to finish his speech on the Geneva award.

Mr. LORD. I move that the House now resume the consideration of the bill for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

Mr. HURLBUT. In view of the peculiar circumstances attending the adoption of the report just agreed to there ought to be no further business to-day.

Mr. LORD. I think so, too.

Mr. O'NEILL. I insist on my motion to adjourn. I do not think the House desires to transact further business to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 525) to amend section 994 of the Revised Statutes relating to justices of the peace in the District of Columbia; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

J. A. YECKLEY.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3724) for the relief of First Lieutenant J. A. Yeckley, Twentieth United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 3725) to amend sections 5185 and 5186 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

FORT SILL.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs a letter from Colonel Mackenzie, relative to matters at Fort Sill; which was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF MILITIA ARMS.

Mr. BANNING also, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of B. Kittredge & Co., of Cincinnati; John L. Moore's Sons, of New York, and other wholesale dealers in military and sporting arms in Saint Louis, New Orleans, and Philadelphia, setting forth that new and good arms issued by the General Government to the States for the armament of the militia, bearing the inspection-mark of the Government, have been thrown upon the market in the city of New York and other places, and asking for legislation preventing executives in States from selling arms issued for the armament of the militia; which was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was given as follows:

To Mr. BRADLEY for ten days;

To Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, for one week;

To Mr. BLAIR for five days;

To Mr. SCALES for ten days; and

To Mr. ASHE for two weeks.

GENERAL LAFAYETTE'S GRANDSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to lay before the House the following letter from Thurlow Weed.

NEW YORK, June 9, 1876.

MY DEAR SIR: Half a century ago General Lafayette revisited America, and as the guest of the nation made a triumphal tour of the States. As you know by reading and tradition, the affection and enthusiasm and gratitude awakened by that visit have no parallel in the world's history. Would it not be equally appropriate and wise half a century after the visit of his grandfather to invite Oscar Lafayette as the guest of the nation to attend the centennial anniversary of our Independence?

Our committee has decided to invite M. Lafayette, but it has occurred to me that Congress might think proper to give broader and deeper effect to a patriotic idea.

Very truly yours,

THURLOW WEED.

Hon. S. S. COX.

The letter was referred to the Committee on the Centennial Exposition.

The question was then taken on Mr. O'NEILL's motion that the House adjourn, and it was agreed to—ayes 94, noes 42.

The House accordingly (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Alvah W. Hicks, for compensation for extraordinary, perilous, and valuable services in running the blockade at Fort Pillow in June, 1862, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of Louis Sonntag, of Company I, Third New Jersey Cavalry, that the records of the War Department be so changed as to show that he was honorably discharged from the Army, to the same committee.

By Mr. BRADLEY: The petition of John H. Russell, that Congress confirm to him the location of certain lands at the Hot Springs, Arkansas, and vest the title to the same in him, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. JENKS: A paper relating to a post-route from Brockwayville, via Dubois, to Luthersburgh, Pennsylvania, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. McCRARY: The petition of Thaddeus S. Stewart, for action upon his petition for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PLAISTED: The petition of Samuel Kealiher, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. SAVAGE: Papers relating to the claim of T. Worthington, late colonel Forty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania: Petitions for the acknowledgment of God and Christianity in the Constitution of the United States, signed by 1,083 persons residing in the States of Kansas, Nebraska, California, Oregon, and Colorado and Washington Territories, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petitions of similar import, signed by 3,645 persons residing in the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Missouri, to the same committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 13, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GO-SI UTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation for the removal of the Go-si Utes to the Uintah reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TAX ON DOMESTIC BEERS.

Mr. HANCOCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and hereby are, directed to inquire into the propriety of relieving from taxation all domestic, fermented, or brewed beers.

LAND CLAIMS IN FLORIDA, LOUISIANA, AND MISSOURI.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3726) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. SEEDS.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1578) for the relief of James M. Seeds, and moved that the bill, as amended, and the accompanying report, be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

H. NELSON.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1395) for the relief of H. Nelson, of the county of Warren, State of Pennsylvania; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PATRICK O'CONNELL.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the petition of Patrick O'Connell, late captain Company F, First Ohio Volunteer Infantry; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY E. SHELTON.

Mr. TERRY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1661) for the relief of Mary E. Shelton, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

STATE-BANK-CIRCULATION TAX.

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3727) to reduce the tax on circulation of State banks to an amount equal to that paid by national banks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. CARMEN.

Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1240) for the relief of William H. Carmen, with amendments; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALFRED FRY.

Mr. STRAIT also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1312) for the relief of the heirs of Alfred Fry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LOAN OF ARTILLERY TO PATERSON, NEW JERSEY.

Mr. CUTLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 125) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the authorities of the city of Paterson, New Jersey, four pieces of artillery, to be used in celebrating July 4, 1876; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Paterson, New Jersey, from the most convenient Government arsenal, four pieces of artillery, to be used by said city in celebrating the 4th of July, 1876, said artillery to be returned immediately after said celebration at the risk and expense of said city authorities.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know I will object to the introduction of this resolution. In common with a great many other members I have received applications of this kind for loan of cannon. I will not be so ungracious as to object to the passage of the resolution, but I call the attention of the House here is an entering-wedge to the loan by the Government of a great many cannon, for if you loan in this instance you must in all others.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLOTHING TO ENLISTED MEN IN THE NAVY.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1080) providing for the outfit and yearly allowance of clothing to enlisted men and boys in the Navy; which was laid on the table.

ENLISTED MEN IN THE NAVY.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 2007) to protect the interest of enlisted men and others in the Navy; which was laid on the table.

UTAH WESTERN RAILROAD.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2652) granting the right of way to the Utah Western Railroad through Rush Lake military reservation; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. HARDENBERGH also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 222) to extend the operations of the Signal Service of the Army so as to benefit the public health; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORRA WILDER.

Mr. HARDENBERGH also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Orra Wilder; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF D. S. MILES.

Mr. HARDENBERGH also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of the heirs of Colonel D. S. Miles; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DEPOSITS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1852) to amend sections 5490 and 5497 of the Revised Statutes regulating the deposits of public money, and that it be laid on the table, and the following letter ordered to be printed in the RECORD; which motion was agreed to:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 30, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a bill to amend sections 5490 and 5497 of the Revised Statutes regulating the deposits of public moneys, (H. R. No. 1852,) on the merits of which you ask my opinion.

Under the provisions of the bill in question, collectors of internal revenue whose offices are located more than twenty miles from any authorized depository will not be prohibited from depositing their collections with private bankers nor the bankers prohibited from receiving the same.

Under the present law and regulations such collections must be deposited with some public depository daily or as soon as the same shall amount to $1,000, and at the close of each month regardless of the amount accumulated.

It is of course very desirable that money belonging to the United States shall, as soon as practicable, pass from the hands of the collectors to the Treasurer's credit in the subtreasury offices or national-bank depositories, where it can be held with greater safety and be subject to the demands of the Government for current disbursement. Internal-revenue taxes are payable only in current funds, and I am aware of no convenience or necessity of the public service which would be served by permitting their deposit, when collected, in private banks.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON,
Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

DETAIL OF OFFICERS.

Mr. TERRY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 166) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 1225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be so amended as to read: "That the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed thirty" instead of twenty in said section provided.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this come before the House by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was objected to on yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late to object now.

Mr. HOLMAN. It shows the absolute necessity of insisting on the regular order. My friend from Tennessee asked the passage of that bill out of order yesterday.

Mr. DIBRELL. No, on Saturday last.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, on Saturday last. It was not to be expected it would be again offered out of order.

Mr. TERRY. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs on Saturday and was acted on this morning, and I was instructed to report it to the House favorably.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What has been done this morning has been done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I perceive it is too late to raise the question of order on the bill or to object to its consideration at this time. I am aware a bill that is in conflict with our general purpose of retrenchment while it happens to favor our local interests is apt to receive favorable consideration. I am aware of that, but I believed that inasmuch as this legislation was directly across the track we are attempting to pursue it could at least be postponed until its impolicy could be made manifest. With the steady effort to reduce the number of officers down to some reasonable proportion the argument is constantly raised in favor of increasing rather than diminishing their number.

I know of no reason why for the purpose of furnishing professors to the institutions of learning throughout the country, in which inevitably a large degree of favoritism must be shown, a large body of employés on the part of the Federal Government should be kept up at a heavy expense, a system creating in many instances unhappy results in the institutions of learning in view of the difference between the salaries paid by the Federal Government and those paid by the more carefully organized institutions of learning. This discrimination produces dissatisfaction and discontent.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that at this time there is a surplus of officers of the Army and there is likely to be one for some time, and that it is well to assign them to some duties?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do know it; and my friend from Tennessee is aware of the fact that so long as this kind of legislation is kept up and new places for Federal officers are furnished, so long will the restoration of the Government to its old basis and to the simplicity of the olden times be absolutely impossible. If it is found that there is a supernumerary body of officers, then, instead of dispensing with their services and retrenching expenditures, the question seems to be to find what new field of employment can be found for them under the pay of the Federal Government.

But, sir, the bill is before the House. I was not aware of its being reported out of order, and I do not now object to it, because it is too late to object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Please allow me a few minutes.

The people I have the honor to represent are very much interested in the passage of this bill. Cornell College, at Mount Vernon, Iowa, was one of the first institutions of learning in the country to test the practicability of teaching military science and tactics in connection with academic studies, under the law of Congress authorizing the Secretary of War to detail military officers for that purpose. From careful inquiry into the work of the gentleman detailed, (Lieutenant Webster,) I am well satisfied that the experiment is successful. Two hundred young men are organized, uniformed, and armed, outside of West Point. The officer asserts their equals in regard to the acquirements of every mental and physical acquisition in that particular line are difficult to find. The boys like it, their parents indorse it, and the faculty testify to marked improvement in hitherto commendable deportment. The State University has lately applied for and has had assigned an instructor, Lieutenant Schenck, from the War Department, under whose management the university students are being successfully organized and educated in military tactics and science.

So far the success has been all that could be desired; but the limits of the law have been reached, and colleges in other States are asking for details. We must surrender one of these gentlemen or increase the number the Secretary of War may detail.

I can imagine no good reason why in time of peace a few of the regular-Army officers cannot be allowed to impart the instructions in civil institutions of learning they have received from the General Government at public expense. There is much that is taught in a military school that is valuable if a boy never sees active service, especially the mental discipline resulting from the very thorough study of mathematics. Besides this, the private schools have no other depository of learning of this kind from which to secure professors to fill these particular chairs. It has been earnestly urged here this session that we have a surplus of Army officers and that many of them should be mustered out. Why not permit them first to give the country the benefit of their acquirements in military training? Let the information they possess in this direction become the property of several classes in some of our colleges in each State and the chairs afterward can be easily filled from the graduates.

It will only be a question of time when each State can furnish military education as readily as any other.

Our future soldiers may as well receive their training at home as abroad. The repugnance felt by many of our best families to sending their boys away from home to a military school will not prevent them from permitting the boys to acquire much that is beneficial in the discipline of a soldier.

The objection raised by the gentleman from Indiana, that the difference between the salary paid the officer and member of the college faculty creates jealousy, does not obtain in Iowa, because we pay our faculties as much as the Government pays a lieutenant, and in some colleges much more.

I hope my friend from Indiana will waive his opposition just long enough to let us become possessed of this art from its proper source. I sympathize with him in most of his efforts toward economy, but in Iowa we consider liberal expenditures to educate, the truest economy. My district supports five colleges with complete faculties, the number of students in each numbering from three hundred to seven hundred and fifty of both sexes. The State of Iowa pays $5,000,000 annually to support the common schools. Congress cannot stop us from educating in every direction. We want you to help us just here.

Iowa College, at Grinnell, has succeeded in securing an instructor in military science outside of the regular Army. I am inclined to think, however, that he received his education at West Point, which proves that such education is in demand even outside of colleges that have the benefit of an officer from the War Department. The bill under consideration increases the number that may be detailed from twenty to thirty, and I do not think they could possibly be better employed. I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TERRY] for his courtesy to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa. The gentleman seems to misapprehend the spirit of my remarks. I object to the bill not simply upon the grounds I have mentioned, which is that it stands in the way of retrenchment and a diminution of the number of employés of the Government, but I object especially to the bill because it belongs to a class of legislation which is more fatal and ruinous to this Government than any other class of legislation. It indicates a tendency to legislate not for the whole people of the United States, not in the interests of the whole mass of the people, but in the interest of special and privileged classes.

Will you tell me, sir, why a few institutions of learning, by the aid of the Federal Treasury, shall be benefited or encouraged while the great body of the American people, those who have not even obtained the benefit of a common-school education, those who are yet without common-school facilities, are limited in the opportunities of education, are debarred of these opportunities to receive the fostering care of the General Government?

Mr. HURLBUT. Where did Ohio get her common-school fund from, or Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why is it that Congress is willing to promote the fortunes of colleges and the higher grades of education, while every effort made to meet the wants of the whole people of the country, the living masses of our children who are to take upon themselves in a few years the reins of government, meets the objection that that kind of legislation does not come within the purview and power of Congress? Special legislation is unhappily the favorite employment of the Congress of the United States; we are constantly enacting laws in the interest of particular classes. The legislation of such a body as Congress should be confined to the enactment of laws affecting the whole body of our people, and for the benefit of every child no matter how humble it may be, who should receive from the law exactly the same benefits as any other child, no matter how favored by fortune. It is because this is a measure of special and class legislation that I object to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. One word in reply. I agree with the gentleman in his views relative to universal education. I have just this to say, that if Congress will permit us to draw on this sole depository of this class of knowledge until we have educated one set of boys, then we will find our instructors at home.

Mr. DIBRELL. This application came up from the East Tennessee University, situated at Knoxville, with upward of three hundred students, one of the finest institutions of learning in the country. When Senator KEY of my State made application to the Secretary of War for an officer for this purpose, he was told that the number allowed by law had already been detailed. He introduced a bill to increase the number of officers to be so detailed from twenty to twenty-five, and the Senate increased the number to thirty, and passed the bill. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will withdraw his objection to this bill. We have a surplus of Army officers, and we cannot obtain better instructors than they are for this purpose.

Mr. BANNING. One word only. The object of this bill is to give to the young men throughout the country some of the advantages that are now enjoyed only by the young men who are fortunate enough to be appointed to West Point. Under the law as it now is twenty officers may be detailed, not to colleges alone, but to any school in the country that has an attendance of one hundred and fifty students. These details are made only to such institutions as ask for them. When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] objects to this detailing of Army officers for this purpose and says that it has been attended with unhappy results, I reply to him that it is not the fault of the law, but the fault of the institutions. No officer is forced upon any institution; no institution in the country obtains the services of one of these officers unless it asks for him.

This bill increases by ten the number of officers that may be detailed for this purpose. Those ten are already asked for by schools that wish to add military education to that already afforded by the institution. As has been already stated, there is a surplus of officers who might much better be performing this duty of teaching the young men of the country than loafing around military posts and doing nothing.

The Government can well afford to do this, to permit these officers to educate our young men and prepare them for military service if we ever again shall need such service. Every gentleman on this floor knows full well the advantages that would have resulted to the country had this course been pursued before the war.

This bill has already passed the Senate. It is no new idea, but an old one; one that has been adopted and in force ever since the war. The number of officers to be detailed is increased by this bill from twenty to thirty, because the people throughout the country ask for them. When my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says that this advantage applies only to colleges and not to the general public, I think he makes a very feeble objection to the bill. At present these officers can educate young men only at West Point. This bill allows officers to be detailed to thirty different colleges throughout the country and to give to the students of those colleges the benefit of the education these officers have received at the expense of the Government. The objection that this only goes to the aristocratic colleges is without foundation. This bill proposes to increase the opportunities of military education from the few to the many. When my friend makes that objection, he shows that he has not studied the bill. I hope it will be passed without further objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I am in favor of this bill, because I know of the good results that have come from the detail of officers of the Army for service in military academies. There is a military academy in my district at Chester, under the superintendence of Colonel Hyatt, which academy has for its instructor an officer of the Army. It is one of the best mathematical institutions of the country and at the same time one of the best-drilled military institutions in the United States. Competent judges who have witnessed the drill of the students there have no hesitation in saying that it is not surpassed by the drill at West Point.

With regard to the objection made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that this applies merely to aristocratic institutions, I want to say to him that the military academy of which I speak is a purely democratic institution; it has the education of boys from all parts of the country, the poor as well as the rich; and a better institution of the kind is nowhere to be found. Before the war it was under military discipline, the school was in charge of a gentleman who had been in the Army. It was then in a high state of military discipline and excellence, and it afforded during the rebellion several young men who afterward turned out to be excellent officers of the Army.

I think this is the best way in which we can employ our supernumerary officers of the Army, to allow them to give this military instruction to the students of academies and colleges, so that hereafter when a war may come upon us, whether foreign or of an internecine character, there shall be men educated and capable of disciplining the armies that we may find it necessary to employ for national defense. I trust, therefore, that this bill may pass.

Mr. TERRY. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, I want the House thoroughly to understand that under the existing law the number of officers who can be detailed for the use of schools, colleges, and universities throughout the country is limited to twenty. The demand from all parts of the Union for additional officers to be detailed for this purpose is overwhelming. It is not confined to any one portion of the country. This bill proposes simply to allow a detail of thirty instead of twenty, making ten additional officers disposable for this purpose. I had no idea that any gentleman here would object to the measure. I do not believe any gentleman would have objected except the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and his grounds of objection, considering the section of country that he represents, are astonishing; for his section, like my own, lives to-day, so far as education is concerned, upon the bounty of this nation.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will allow me to say, however, that it is a bounty which extends to every child in the community, which is not specially applied to a few out of many thousands of youth, and these the most favored already by fortune.

Mr. HURLBUT. If the gentleman will increase the Army so that we can detail an officer for every public school in the country, I have no objection. We ought not to object to giving this advantage to those who ask it, just so far as our means can go; and the idea that it is a breach of the ordinary habit or principles of the Government to apply either its men or its means to the education of the people is a falsification of the history of the whole country. When Virginia gave the Northwestern Territory to the Union, she accompanied the gift by a reservation from which have sprung the large and valuable school funds of all the Northwestern States. No greater gift was ever given to this nation than was given by Virginia in that reservation for the establishment of schools; and the gentleman from Indiana knows it, because he himself is one of the offspring of that school system.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. That is what I have been boasting of. It is that system I have been advocating; not a partial, discriminating system which would extend certain privileges to thirty colleges of the country at the expense of the mass of the people.

Mr. HURLBUT. The gentleman does not do any credit to the liberality of the Government which has educated him and thousands of others.

Now, sir, this is merely a proposition to extend to such institutions of learning throughout the country as desire to take it the benefit of the services of these officers. We have them now disposable for this purpose, without injury to the service; and I think we are going to have them, the gentleman from Indiana to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will allow me to say that I do owe to this Government and its bounty the little education I have. I obtained it through the common-school system. The common school is the true university of this nation—the one that is entitled to and has received the fostering care of this Government; for it has sought to reach every child in the nation. The gentleman, by this bill, would give the benefit of the fostering care of the Government not to all the children of the country, but he would assign to one out of ten colleges—perhaps one out of twenty or one out of thirty—the benefit of an educated professor, while he would deprive all other institutions of learning of such an advantage. The gentleman would carry on this Government upon the principle of the olden time—the principle of favoring a particular class—while I advocate legislation which, with its beneficent influence, reaches alike every citizen of the nation.

Mr. HURLBUT. O! I have heard that ever since I was born.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know you have; and you will hear it hereafter.

Mr. TERRY. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if the House understood the original law as it stands upon the statute-book and the amendment proposed in the pending bill there could not be any very material objection to the passage of the measure. The only one which I have heard is that emanating from the gentleman from Indiana; and it is predicated upon the idea that, because you cannot extend the benefit of this provision to every school in the country, however small it may be in its numbers or limited in its operations, therefore you should deny it altogether. If the original act had any virtue in it, the amendment now proposed will simply extend the benefits and advantages accruing from such a course of instruction to other schools than those now embraced in it.

It should be observed that the provision of the section now proposed to be amended is limited in its application to schools having capacity to instruct one hundred and fifty male students; and authority is given to the President of the United States and the Secretary of War to make the designation of such officers of the Army as can be spared for the purpose of giving this instruction. I ask that the original section may be read from the Clerk's desk in order that its provisions may be understood. I think then there can be no possible objection to the bill now proposed, which is designed simply to enlarge and extend the privileges of the existing law.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1225. The President may, upon the application of any established college or university within the United States having capacity to educate, at the same time, not less than one hundred and fifty male students, detail an officer of the Army to act as president, superintendent, or professor thereof; but the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed twenty at any time, and they shall be apportioned throughout the United States, as nearly as may be practicable, according to population. Officers so detailed shall be governed by general rules prescribed, from time to time, by the President. The Secretary of War is authorized to issue, at his discretion and under proper regulations to be prescribed by him, out of any small-arms or pieces of field-artillery belonging to the Government and which can be spared for that purpose, such number of the same as may appear to be required for military instruction and practice by the students of any college or university under the provisions of this section; and the Secretary shall require a bond in each case, in double the value of the property, for the care and safe-keeping thereof, and for the return of the same when required. (See section 1667.)

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman whether he approves of the class legislation involved in the first section of this bill?

Mr. HOOKER. Well, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana I will not say that I do not suppose anybody thinks it would be possible to constitute a military academy in every school in this country, but I do approve the allowing of officers of the Army who may be disengaged and where without any additional expense it can be done, to instruct the pupils in the various schools designated in the original act. I do approve of it. I see no impropriety in it, and I am unable to see the force of the argument that, because the benefit intended to be conferred upon particular schools and colleges cannot be extended to every old field school in the country, therefore it ought not to be extended to a sufficient number under the terms of the original act to allow them to be organized into military academies to drill their scholars in military science.

Mr. HOLMAN. As a measure of legislation this provision of law goes to the very extremity of special class legislation. I hold, sir, it is the duty of Congress to legislate in such manner as directly to reach the whole of our people with the beneficent influence of the law, and not to promote simply the private interest of any particular class at the expense of the whole people.

Mr. HOOKER. Then you ought to move to repeal the original act.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the law to which this bill from the Senate is an amendment originated in 1866 and 1867. I remember the circumstances very well. It was carefully examined and considered by the educational interests of the country. As the question was presented to the House it originated mainly with an officer of the Army who had been debarred from participating in the controversies of past years but desired to do something for his country, and the idea occurred to him that the extension of the means of military education was one of those subjects to which he could well devote himself. All the educational interests of the country were consulted in regard to it. In the first instance there was not a university, or academy, or educational interest or element that expressed an opinion against it. Then it came to the Executive Departments of the Government, and after full examination it was confirmed by them, and the two Houses of Congress passed the bill with scarcely any objection. And I am glad to know after ten or twelve years it has so far vindicated itself in practice as to justify the extension of the principles and methods of education which are embodied in this bill.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is in error in supposing this is limited to any class at all. It is not limited to any class, unless the subject of military education can be said of itself to be absolutely limited to a class. The proposition is for the Government that has an institution for the education of persons in military science, and who by that education become themselves professors of military art and military science, to allow the service of those officers to be extended to the universities of the country for the purpose of teaching and imparting the theories and principles of that science, that military art, to the students generally throughout the country, to all the students of the country, of whatever character, and wherever they may be.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. BANKS. Wait one moment, and I will come to your point. That was as far as the Government could do it. It was limited in the first instance to a few universities, three or four, which had made application, having examined the subject and desired that assistance and were willing to make the experiment. It is now proposed to be extended still further.

Let me ask the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to this point. These professors, these West Point graduates if you please, afterward become professors, the scholars of the universities become professors in the academies, imparting military science, the military history of the country, and comprehension of the military art to all other students. The students of the universities who have become educated in this way in military science become in time teachers of the higher schools; teachers of the middle schools; teachers of the lower schools. Each one as he moves from this central point imparts his knowledge, science, and attainments, until ultimately they extend to all the students in the lower schools as well as in the higher schools. So that in the end every person who becomes a teacher will have acquired more or less of this knowledge of the military art and military science, and will impart it to the pupils of every school in the country without exception, restriction, or limitation. There is not a school in the district which I represent which may not in the end be benefited directly, not indeed by the professor who may come from West Point, but by the acquisition of this military science on the part of the pupils of these universities, who in the end become teachers of the lower schools, and finally instruct all the people of the country in this art.

Let me say a word about the object and necessity of this kind of instruction in this country. Military science has been limited to a single school. I cannot say it is due to the fact I propose to speak of, but it will have in the end the effect of creating a class of men devoted to military science alone, and who in case of trouble, whether among ourselves or with foreign nations, will become themselves the sole representatives of this military art, and military science. And we turn to them, sir; to them alone. The whole country is taught to regard them as the only persons upon whom we can rely for defense. Why? Because there is no other military education, generally speaking, except that which is given to them; and as a matter of course they will, having rendered the country great services in this way, in good time become the representatives of the civil power as well as of the military power; and thus seriously will be undermined the very foundations of republican or democratic government.

Does the gentleman from Indiana propose or desire any such result as this? I know he cannot. I know he does not. But that is the effect of the policy which he advocates. I am not for war. For the whole of my life I have resisted, as far as I was able, any appeal to arms. I am not afraid to repeat what I have said here often, and in my own part of the country still more frequently, that we have never gained anything by an appeal to arms that we could not better have gained in other ways. But it takes two men to keep peace, while one man can make war. Therefore we must be prepared for war. And to be prepared for war it is not enough that we have a class educated to that kind of business which sometimes comes to a republic as well as to an empire or monarchy. The whole people must be capable of defending themselves; and the country never will and never can be able to defend itself until the whole people shall have more or less of this instruction and this faculty. And this is the best, the wisest, and the most democratic method that can be devised to impart this education to the young people of the country who need it and desire it.

I hope, therefore, inasmuch as this bill from the Senate is only a limitation or restriction upon the idea, fixing a point beyond which we shall not go, that the House will give its assent to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts possibly assume that this measure is in any sense a measure of general application, when a great number of the children of this nation are not even provided under the fostering care of this Government with the benefits of a common-school education and a still vaster number under the fortunes that surround them can only have the benefits of a common-school education, and no efforts are being made on the part of the Federal Government to increase the facilities of the great body of our children to obtain even those benefits? Nor do gentlemen assume that the Federal Government should take the general subject of education under its charge. Can the gentleman, therefore, say that a law like this is general in its purposes which is so partial in its effects that it reaches only to the sons of those of our citizens who are able to secure to their children much beyond the benefits of a common-school education? Can a law be more partial than this? And you do not even propose to extend this law to all the colleges in the various States. You do not confer even upon the young men of all the higher institutions of learning in each State of the Union the benefit of this particular form of education which the distinguished gentleman esteems so valuable for the citizens of this country.

I cannot imagine a law more partial even in its operation, and I hold that a republican government forgets its highest obligation when it confers upon any class of citizens, except in connection with the administration of the government, rights and opportunities which do not belong in common to the whole people. I abhor that legislation which confers special benefits on the few and withholds them from the greater number. We can well understand why in that great country from whence we drew our origin a few institutions of learning, and notably those of Oxford and Cambridge, should be fostered by government and should have become pillars of the state. It is because there the state in the main rests upon a favored class of its people. But that any one should contend that in a government of the people that system of education should be fostered which reaches and benefits only a favored class, while multitudes of the generation that is coming are left destitute of the benefits of that degree of education which would fit them for citizenship, is to me incomprehensible.

I hold on the subject of education that whatever qualifies a citizen for the duties of citizenship should be alike common to all, and that any legislation upon that subject which does not tend to that result is not in harmony with the genius and spirit of our republican institutions. It is true that the Federal Government, in view of the greater efficiency and noble rivalry of the States, may not enter upon the general field of education, but the spirit of our institutions demands that every aid the Federal Government shall extend to the high cause of education should be as broad as the Republic and reach in its beneficent influences every child of the nation.

The defense of West Point and the Naval Academy has always been that they were not simply institutions of learning, but necessary agents of the Government in the organization of its armies; institutions having no relations to the general education of the people, but the organization of the military and naval forces of the Government.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to make a single inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana. Am I correct in understanding the gentleman from Indiana as arguing that because you cannot impart military instruction to every single youth in the land you should impart it to none?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi scarcely supposes that a branch of learning which may come into use once perhaps in the progress of two or three generations should be the subject of the special fostering care of this Government as a feature of its general system of education. It is a branch of learning the necessity for which is happily passing away. It was well enough for the Middle Ages, and it was a natural feature in the conflicting despotisms of Europe, where organized armies kept the people in subjection. It is the education of monarchies, not of republics. But the idea is becoming abhorrent even in liberal monarchies that education in the murderous art of war should be a special object of the Government. The grand idea that it is through the education and agencies of peace that the whole human race should be elevated swells the heart of our period. In these circumstances does the gentleman think it necessary that the Federal Government should foster by a heavy taxation of the people education in the art of war?

Mr. HOOKER. That is avoiding my inquiry.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; when this Government, through its great and prosperous States, shall have furnished to every child in the land the benefit of a common-school education, so that he shall be prepared to enter on the high duties of citizenship armed and equipped, it will have accomplished a great work worthy of the Republic and of the age. I would rejoice in seeing that standard of education raised higher and higher, but I insist that it shall in its progress be so directed that it shall reach alike every child of the Republic so far as the system of education shall be under the fostering care of the Government, whether remote or direct.

The spirit of special legislation should be dying out. Favoritism in legislation is against the spirit of the age. This, I hope, is one of its last struggles. The spirit of universality is the one that inspires the nation, especially in all its purposes for the education and elevation of its people.

Mr. BANNING. I would ask the gentleman if this does not make the military education of the people far more general than it now is?

Mr. HOLMAN. It applies to but a handful of the youth of the nation. My friend claiming to be a republican—I use the term in its highest sense—and a democrat and is yet favoring a system of legislation that would open up superior opportunities to a few boys who have already had superior advantages of education by good fortune above their fellows, and would furnish to them at the expense of the whole people the opportunity to pursue a class of studies from which the great mass of the youth of the country are debarred. Is this democracy?

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman is defending a system which proposes to educate our youth in this branch only at one college, while this bill proposes to educate them at thirty.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, certainly not; the one college is for the benefit of the Government, not for the benefit of education. I would willingly see West Point abolished; but it has been the policy of the Government through long years to foster that institution as a necessity of Government, and traditions have gathered around West Point investing it with a glow of patriotism and almost of reverence to the American people. We preserve it as a tradition of the Republic and an agent of Government, not as simply an institution of learning; while this bill involves a matter of the common education of the whole people. My friend forgets that the moment that he breaks loose from the grand doctrine of America, the fundamental idea of our Government, that whatever appertains to the rights and immunities of the citizens shall be equal and common to all—that whenever he breaks loose from that principle and ventures into the traditions of the middle-age system, then he meets at every step the principles of republican government springing up to confront him. Let us have laws of education that shall not discriminate in favor of a portion of our citizens, but apply alike to all. It is for that reason that I object to a system of legislation which in the matter of education singles out a handful of our youths and gives them, at the expense of the nation, further advantages of education than those they already enjoy in being educated in the higher branches of learning.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to know if this debate is continuing under any rule?

Mr. TERRY. I did intend saying a word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana on the matter of economy, but so much has been said upon this subject that I will not further detain the House, but will call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I attach no such weight to the question of economy as I do to the question of principle involved here.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will allow me to answer a question put to me by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. TERRY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman asked me a question and I want to answer it in the affirmative. He inquires if this measure is one that reaches the common schools of the country, if the pupils of the common schools are to reap the advantages of it, and I answer that they are. There are no common schools without the higher school of education. It is from them that we get teachers and professors, and if there is to be any military education in this country of a general character it must come from this measure and no other.

Now the gentleman from Indiana does not propose, as I understand him, to interfere with the military school at West Point. He sustains that. Under his idea all the military education of the country is to be obtained there from professors under the favor of the Government. Is that a democratic institution or a democratic idea? And not only that, but he desires that all the education of a military character shall be limited to the pupils of that school, and that all the people who have military knowledge shall have been trained in that school. Does the gentleman from Indiana call that a democratic theory? Certainly not. If you are to have military education you must provide measures for general instruction. If this principle is extended, as I have no doubt it will be, and if this policy, of which this is but the beginning, shall be successful, I venture to say that it will provide military instruction for ordinary purposes in every common school in the land.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was not the experience of the last war such as to teach our people that acquirements in military sience were of such a character that in a free Government like ours all that was requisite in that field of learning could be acquired almost upon the impulse of the moment? Were not some of the most successful generals of the Army men who had never devoted themselves at all to military science until the tocsin of war was sounded? And when I look at the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT,] and others who honor this floor by their presence and shed luster upon arms in the late war, I know there can be but one answer to that question, that is, that among a free people preparation for war is always made, and there is no necessity for wasting the time of our youth in acquiring that branch of learning, when from the very spirit and nature of our institutions we are always armed and equipped.

Mr. BANKS. There is but one answer to the question which the gentleman propounds, and that is that the advantage in the beginning of the war, as I doubt not every volunteer officer and soldier of the northern army and of the southern army perhaps will admit, was absolutely and overwhelming with the graduates of West Point Academy. In the commencement of the war every man in the Army believed that it was scarcely safe to enter upon a campaign unless we had one or more of these officers in command of the volunteer forces of the Army. It is, however, true that after two or three years' experience in active service the volunteers acquired skill; and I do not stand here to say that their skill was not equal to that of the graduates of West Point Academy. But I will say this, and every soldier on this floor will justify me in saying it, that no volunteer officer, at least of the northern Army, ever for a single moment had that credit with the country, the Government, or the people for whatever services he might have performed that these graduates of West Point Academy universally received from the Government and the people. That was because the West Point graduates were supposed to have been thoroughly educated in their profession and the volunteer officers were supposed not to have been so educated. It was an injustice to the volunteer for which the country never can atone.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BANKS. I would prefer not to be led away from my argument.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman if he has observed how this system has been carried out heretofore? Have these officers been assigned generally among the States in proportion to population, or what has been the practice in that regard?

Mr. BANKS. It has been an experiment. Whenever a university or one of the higher schools in Kentucky, for instance, has asked the Government to assign an officer to a military professorship in that institution, the request has been granted if there have been such officers to be assigned.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I understand the law very well; but I ask the gentleman if he has observed how these professors have been assigned, whether to the States generally or to particular sections?

Mr. BANKS. They have been assigned wherever they have been required; that is the intention of the law.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not true in practice.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] I would ask the gentleman who reports this bill [Mr. TERRY] if it provides for a fair and equal assignment of these officers among the States, or is it left discretionary with the Secretary of War or the President where to assign them? If the bill does not provide for that it should do so. With such a provision I would not object to the bill; without it I would be opposed to its passage.

Mr. BANKS. The assignment is made at the discretion of the Government, because the number of officers for this purpose is not equal to the calls upon the Government for them. If you will increase the number of these officers you will have them in every section of the country, and in every school wherever wanted.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] permit me to answer the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES?]

Mr. BANKS. I prefer to go on. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has said that this was a proposition to extend a murderous system of policy; that is, the policy of war. Permit me to say that it is exactly the opposite of that; it is a measure to strengthen the policy of peace. There is nothing that tends so much to the maintenance of peace among individuals and among nations as a knowledge that each individual or each nation is prepared for war if forced upon him or it.

What is it that keeps the states of Europe at peace at this moment, with their seven millions of armed men? It is the knowledge that every state is prepared for war, and if war should once commence it would involve the whole of Europe. It is this preparation for war that preserves nations from war. What led the first Napoleon to his destruction? It was his belief and declaration that the people of England were a nation of shop-keepers and would not fight. What led us into our controversy so much as the belief on the one side and the other that its opponents would not fight?

To be prepared for war, to comprehend and fully understand its terrible conditions and results, is the best way to obtain and maintain peace. That was in fact the legacy of Washington. "There is a rank due to the United States among nations," he said "that will be withheld, if not absolutely lost by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid it we must be able to repel it. If we desire peace, it must be known that at all times we are ready for war." The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JONES] ought to be able to comprehend that this is a measure in the interest of peace. For myself I would never have uttered one word in favor of it, and would not now, except as a measure of peace.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. As an answer to some extent to my own question, I desire to call attention to the section of the Revised Statutes to which this bill relates. Section 1225, after providing that the President may detail an officer of the Army to act as president, superintendent, or professor of any established college or university having capacity to educate at the same time not less than one hundred and fifty students, goes on to provide that—

> The number of officers so detailed shall not exceed twenty at any time, and they shall be apportioned throughout the United States, as nearly as may be practicable, according to population.

I hold that under that provision the Secretary of War or the President must distribute these officers fairly and justly among the States.

Mr. TERRY. Inasmuch as nobody has spoken against the bill except one gentleman, I yield to my friend from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who I understand desires to oppose it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that a proposition of this sort should come from a committee on this side of the House; for it involves the right of the Federal Government to take charge of the proper education of the people in the several States. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] urges that this amendatory bill provides only for an addition of ten officers to the number allowed by existing law. But is that meeting the question properly? If this power does not reside with the Federal Government, is it not time that instead of acting on what has been done we should correct what has been erroneously done. If we may go forward in building up these institutions in the several States, where is the limit of our power? Where are the boundaries? Where is the voice that shall say, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther?" For one I believe that this country is not now asking for this measure. The cry is not coming up from the States for military education; the cry is not coming up for an increase of expenditures. The sentiment of the people does not favor any excuse for multiplying Army officers. If we have too many of them, more than the public service requires, let us not seek to perpetuate them upon the people of the country by assigning them to the business of educating the people.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me to answer his inquiry?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will in a moment. If the excuse is that you have too many Army officers, then respond to the cries of the distressed people of the country; restrict the number of officers; reduce expenditures; take your heavy hand off the industries of the people.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman will allow me to say that I am not aware of anything in this bill which forces these instructors upon any State. They are never sent anywhere except at the instance of colleges that apply for them under the law. There is no power to send them unless they are called for. If they are not wanted in any State, they certainly will not be sent.

Mr. BLOUNT. If they are wanted, what right have we to appropriate money to meet a wish of that kind? Where will the gentleman find the power to appropriate money for such a purpose? If we have power to do this, why have we not power to legislate broadly on this whole subject of education? My colleague [Mr. COOK] says that no appropriation is asked for. I will tell him of one thing that is asked for, retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government. If these officers are useless for the military purposes of the country, let us not maintain these expensive salaries; let them be abolished.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] for whose wisdom and patriotism I have the highest regard—who never speaks without winning my attention and respect—has attempted to defend this proposition on a ground which I think is entirely untenable. He says that we tried the assignment of three officers for this purpose and found advantage from it; we then tried twenty and found advantage from it; and therefore we should increase the number. Sir, if that is the way we are to proceed where will be the end? We have thirty-seven States with a vast number of colleges scattered through them. The measure now proposed is not expected by any one to meet all the demands in this direction. When you have inaugurated this movement, where is it to stop?

Mr. Speaker, for one I feel that it is the duty of the Representatives of the people at this hour to meet wherever they can the demand for retrenchment. I appreciate the benefits to be derived from the assignment of these officers to this duty. I would like to have one in my own State; and I believe there is a pending application of that kind. But, sir, because we would like to have the services of these officers for nothing, I will not violate what I deem to be a principle of the Constitution, I will not violate the demand of the day for retrenchment. Why, sir, we have a perfect army of officers. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] attempts to magnify the great advantages of military education throughout the States. Sir, we are isolated; we are separated by a vast ocean from the other great powers of the world. Why should gentlemen try to alarm us on this subject? For one I have no fear of an invading foe. We have a gallant people ready for war whenever it shall come and capable of defending the country from all harm.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him wherein this increases expenditures?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will answer with a great deal of pleasure. If these Army officers can be spared from the military service of the country to be assigned to educational purposes, then they are not needed for the military purposes of the Government; and, if they are not needed, I say we have no right to maintain them for the purpose of devoting their services to the education of the people.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said about the question of economy that I will say one word. We do not propose by this measure to increase the expenses of the Government a single dollar. We have at present upon the rolls many officers whose services are not now required in the Army. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will bring forward a bill to reduce the number of Army officers, I will vote for it; but while we have this large number of supernumerary officers doing nothing, I say let them be assigned to the civil institutions of learning, and let them earn their pay by giving instruction there.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, sir, a bill reducing the number of our Army officers is now pending in the House.

Mr. TERRY. I demand the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. TERRY. No, sir; I cannot yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow it to be read?

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That section 1225 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to extend the privilege of a detail of an officer of the United States Army to any educational institution within the United States having a capacity to educate one hundred male students at the same time, the number of officers so detailed not to exceed thirty in all.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to allow that amendment to be offered.

Mr. TERRY. I am not instructed by my committee to permit any amendments; and I must decline to comply with the gentleman's request.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may read a single paragraph bearing upon this subject.

Mr. TERRY. Very well.

Mr. GARFIELD. The remarks made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] were so striking on two points—first, on the constitutional power of this Congress to do anything in regard to education in the States and, second, in regard to our less need of education of this sort in an isolated country like ours—that it has occurred to me to read a paragraph from a very venerable document to which I am sure everybody in the House will listen with pleasure.

I read from the second annual message of George Washington to the Congress of the United States. After recommending Congress under the Constitution to take into consideration the care of manufactures, the advancement of agriculture and commerce, the establishment of uniformity of weights, measures, and the like. He says:

Nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in opinion that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. Knowledge is in every country the surest basis of public happiness. In one in which the measures of Government receive their impression so immediately from the sense of the community as in ours it is proportionably essential. To the security of a free constitution it contributes in various ways: by convincing those who are intrusted with the public administration that every valuable end of government is best answered by the enlightened confidence of the people, and by teaching the people themselves to know and to value their own rights, to discern and provide against invasions of them; to distinguish between oppression and the necessary exercise of lawful authority, between burdens proceeding from a disregard to their convenience and those resulting from the inevitable exigencies of society; to discriminate the spirit of liberty from that of licentiousness, cherishing the first, avoiding the last, and uniting a speedy but temperate vigilance against encroachments with an inviolable respect to the laws.

Now listen, and remember this is an address to Congress:

Whether this desirable object will be best promoted by affording aids to seminaries of learning already established, by the institution of a national university, or by any other expedients, will be well worthy of a place in the deliberations of the Legislature.

I commend to the gentleman who has so much fear of the constitutional powers of this Congress to do anything in encouragement of education to ponder awhile upon this second annual message of the first President of the United States.

Mr. TERRY. I must insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 133.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not a sufficient number.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. TERRY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 38, noes not counted.

So (more than one-fifth of those present having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 50, not voting 117; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Beebe, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Caulfield, Cochrane, Collins, Cook, Cromse, Cutler, Danford, Davis, De Bolt, Denison, Dibrell, Douglas, Dunnell, Durand, Durham, Eames, Egbert, Finley, Franklin, Frost, Garfield, Ganse, Glover, Goode, Gunter, Hancock, Benjamin W. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Woodworth—117.

So the bill was passed.

During the vote,

Mr. WILLARD stated that his colleagues, Mr. WALDRON, Mr. WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS, Mr. BRADLEY, and Mr. HUBBELL, were absent by leave of the House.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY stated that he was paired with Mr. EVANS.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 40) to re-imburse B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, for internal-revenue stamps stolen from Cambridge (Ohio) post-office;

An act (H. R. No. 353) to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, defining the jurisdiction of Washington Territory; and

An act (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to a bill of the House (H. R. No. 3481) extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ROADS IN ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers on a bill (H. R. No. 3608) to provide for the construction of military roads in Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WAREHOUSES, ETC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting copies of application for leases to build wharves, warehouses, &c., upon the east bank of the Potomac River; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

LIEUTENANT CHARLES METCALFE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting additional papers in the case of Lieutenant Charles Metcalfe; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INSANE ASYLUM.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a report on admissions into the Insane Asylum of the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

MARTHA A. ASHBURN.

Mr. COCHRANE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back adversely in the matter of the claim of Martha A. Ashburn, widow of George W. Ashburn; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. JENKS. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from a bill in order that it may be put on its passage at this time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to taking any bill from the Private Calendar unless some good and special reason is assigned therefor.

GEORGE EYSTER.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3728) for the relief of George Eyster, assistant treasurer of the United States, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EIGHTH CAVALRY MISSOURI STATE MILITIA.

Mr. GLOVER, by unanimous consent from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Eighth Cavalry of the Missouri State Militia, with amendments; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM M. PLEAS AND F. S. JONES.

Mr. GLOVER also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1057) for the relief of William M. Pleas and F. S. Jones, with amendments; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

O. E. BABCOCK.

Mr. GLOVER also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back copies of orders, letters, telegrams, &c., filed in the Adjutant-General's Office relating to the assembly on the business of the military court of inquiry called to inquire into the conduct of Colonel O. E. Babcock, and moved its reference to the Committee on Whisky Frauds; which motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER THE WABASH RIVER.

Mr. ATKINS. I now call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield on condition that it gives rise to no debate.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask leave to submit a report from the Committee on Commerce authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River. The bill is not lengthy, and will not take up much time.

Mr. ATKINS. If it is going to excite discussion, I must object.

Mr. DUNNELL. There will be no discussion on the bill. If there is I will withdraw it.

The bill was read.

Mr. DUNNELL. The second section of the bill is the section added to bills authorizing the construction of these bridges.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve objection to this bill for a moment until I state the grounds of my objection. I will state the grounds of my objection, and the gentleman can correct his bill in these particulars. The question as to the length of the span and height above high-water mark is not left to the Secretary of War.

Mr. ATKINS. If discussion is going to spring up, I object and call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. DUNNELL. This is in harmony with bills already passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. We paid no attention to the Wabash until we began to spend large sums of money to improve its navigation, $75,000 for the present year. I must insist that the Secretary of War shall determine the width of the span and height above high-water mark, and also that any change required by the Secretary of War shall be at the expense of the company. As this bill may be reported by the Committee on Commerce, I ask that my amendments be included.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill can be put in shape in a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object?

Mr. ATKINS. If it is going to take up any time, I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must have another answer if the gentleman insists on his objection.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman assured me that it would not give rise to any debate. I do not like to be discourteous, but I must insist on my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not before the House.

GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. MORRISON. I am asked by gentlemen on the other side of the House to make the following request for unanimous consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sessions of Wednesday and Thursday shall be devoted to the consideration of special orders now pending, and no vote be taken thereon or question determined on which a division shall be demanded.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. ATKINS. That practically dispenses with the consideration of the Army bill and the action of the House upon it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not dispense with the consideration of the Army bill so far as general debate is concerned. But any action on this bill is dispensed with if this resolution be adopted. Is there objection?

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the proposition is not before the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. WALLING. I do not desire to antagonize this bill, but I would say to gentlemen who have charge of bills which committees are ready to report that if they expect to have them brought before the House the morning hour must be insisted on.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the eleventh appropriation bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations during this session. It is the last except one of all of the regular appropriation bills usually passed by Congress. And when the remaining one shall have been presented, we will then have, in the language of the British House of Commons, the "budget" for the ensuing fiscal year. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, a proper time for this House to take an observation, that we may know exactly where we stand with reference to the expenditures of the Government and the resources of the Government by which these expenditures shall be maintained.

I propose, sir, in the time that shall be allotted to me in this discussion to address myself more to the general question as to the expenditures and resources and the general condition of the country with reference to the public burdens than I shall attempt to enter into any discussion of the propositions contained in detail in the bill itself. I have given some reflection to this general question and have matured some thoughts directly bearing upon the resources of the Government as it stands at this time and as to its probable condition at the end of the next fiscal year; whether it is in default now of the estimates, and whether it will not be still more so this time next year. In this connection I shall refer somewhat in detail to the past extravagance of the Administration, the general tendency to undue expenditure, and the clear duty of this House in view of the professions and criticisms of the democratic party.

As preliminary to a consideration of this subject, I desire to call the attention of the House to the peculiarity of our past history and the leading developments of our national existence. Were I to write the history of this country for the century just closing, I would separate it into four great epochs, namely:

First, from 1776 to 1801, as that distinguished as the revolutionary era, the grand struggle for freedom from the British Crown, the formation of a confederated league, the adoption of the Constitution, and the creation of a more effective and united government, and the annunciation of the true theory of republicanism, as developed in the system of Thomas Jefferson.

Second, from 1801 to 1826, for the final consummation of entire independence of England in the second war with that power, the gradual development of trade and commerce, and the settlement of certain grave questions of government finances and foreign policy, including the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida.

Third, from 1826 to 1851, for the further extension of territory in the additions of Texas and our Pacific possessions, the discovery and working of the gold and silver mines, and in the commencement of a brighter era, which, if rightly appreciated and directed, would have laid the foundation for a national prosperity in an enlarged material development in excess of anything in the history of this or any other people.

Fourth, from 1851 to 1876, for the humiliating exhibition of general financial and commercial intoxication, the most terrible civil war of any age, followed by public and private demoralization, the accession to power over the Government of a combination formed of the worst and the best but weakest elements of society, and the consequent introduction of extravagance, profligacy, and corruption in the management of public affairs and throughout the body-politic; the period of sensationalism, of pretense, of assumption, and of inferior and diluted intellects struggling with each other for the control of the Government, for the better advantage of each other. Such is the humiliating spectacle presented to the world by this truly great people, who in an evil hour have become untrue to their fathers and themselves.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is our position to-day. Such is our condition as a government, and such is our condition socially. In all our industrial and material interests we have, in common parlance, been living far beyond our resources; I mean our legitimate resources. The scale of expenditures has been largely in excess of our means. What were once thought to be mere luxuries have become necessities. Men who formerly could live upon $2,500 a year now require $5,000 and $10,000 a year, and are not as comfortable, nor as happy, nor as upright as formerly upon that sum. Our Government, which during the war spent at one period $1,500,000,000 a year, after war had ceased found it almost impossible to reduce those expenditures. The impure infusion into the Government would not come down to a peace basis. It was only by the bold and aggressive attitude of the minority in Congress that any material reductions were effected at all. But though reductions were made from the war scale of expenditures, look at the gradual increase effected notwithstanding. I print tables gathered from official data, which of themselves abundantly prove the successful efforts of the party in power to force back again the former enormous disbursements. I call the attention of the House and the country to the fruits of republican misrule as exemplified and illustrated in what is here presented.

I submit a comparative table of expenditures or appropriations for the public service, collated from reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and other official documents:

Nor is this general increase in expenditures the only proof of extravagance, to call it by the mildest phrase, of the Government under the present party. The increase in the civil list furnishes additional evidence if it were required. I ask a careful examination of the following table as exhibiting the fact that a larger number of employés have been borne upon the pay-rolls since the war than during the war. Certainly the object must have been for other purposes than to conduct merely official duties. It is not uncharitable to conclude that this horde of paid dependents was in the main but auxiliary to the general working of the political machine, devoted more to the continuance of the ruling power than to the public weal.

In view of these facts, the question presents itself should the people of the United States bear this burden, even if they were able to do so? Admit that our material interests were in a condition of great prosperity; admit that we were where we were a few years ago, when all of us were doing well and making money, and many of us saving something besides our expenditures. I submit, that however wealthy the people may be it is not necessary that so large a number of officials should be employed for governmental purposes, or that such a large expenditure of money should be incurred. I believe it is demonstrable that our Government can be maintained efficiently, the public interest better preserved and protected by a reduction of at least 35 to 40 per cent. in the number of employés and in the general disbursements.

But are the people able to bear their large burdens at this time even if the present scale of expenditures are necessary? What is the present condition of the Treasury? For this is a pertinent and indeed a vital question we should ask ourselves in this connection.

A government, like an individual, should live within its means. If in either case the cost of living is in excess of the income, the deficit must be provided for in some way, either by levying contributions upon others, by borrowing, or by retrenchment. I have ascertained from the best available official sources the present condition of the Treasury at this time, the end of the present fiscal year. My data is entirely reliable if we can place confidence in the official statements of those who have the immediate charge of the Treasury.

Statement of condition of the Treasury, June 30, 1876.

The estimate of receipts for the present year (see report of Secretary of the Treasury, 1875, page vi) was		$297,456,145 14
The actual receipts for eleven months and estimate for the present month is officially stated		286,247,387 76
Difference between estimates and receipts		11,208,757 38
The expenditures for same period was estimated (report of Secretary of the Treasury, page vi) at		268,447,543 76
Actual expenditures for eleven months and estimate for present month, as officially stated, not including sinking fund		263,138,853 53
		5,308,690 23
Add to this the balance due the sinking fund, after deducting $13,000,000, the only bonds called for this year	$32,293,692 32
Deficiency at end of present fiscal year		24,602,382 55

NOTE.—The retired legal-tender and fractional currency redeemed are no part of the sinking fund under the act of February 25, 1862.

Estimated condition of the Treasury for 1877.

Estimated expenditures, (see report of Secretary of the Treasury, December 6, 1875, page vi)	$269,265,000 00
Add to this sinking fund, (see report of Secretary of the Treasury, page vii)	34,063,377 40
To this add deficiency for 1876	24,602,382 55
Total to be provided for	327,930,759 95
To provide for this take same total receipts as the present year	286,247,387 76
Probable deficiency at end of fiscal year 1877	41,683,372 19

In these statements it will be observed that the required contribution to the sinking fund is provided for. Though it is my belief that the Government is not indebted to this fund at all, owing to the large purchases by Mr. BOUTWELL when Secretary of the Treasury of outstanding bonds, yet in view of the positively expressed intention of Mr. Bristow in his last annual report of adhering strictly to the requirement of the law which sets apart a portion of the coin receipts as a special fund for this object, I do not see why it should not be included as one of the obligations of the Government. To consider the legal-tenders and fractional currency redeemed under recent acts of Congress as complying with the law of 1862 as proper appropriation to this fund is, in my opinion, an evasion of the clearly expressed determination of the Secretary in his report to Congress referring to this subject. The sinking-fund account, therefore, stands thus:

Sinking-fund account, (official,) 1875 and 1876.

For 1875:
Due		$31,096,545
Applied		25,170,400
Balance due		5,926,145
For 1876:
Due	$32,140,914
Applied	13,000,000
Balance due		19,140,914
Now due		25,067,059

(See report Secretary of the Treasury, December, 1876, pages x and xi.)

Such is the condition of the public finances. It is obvious the Government cannot bear the burden which has been imposed upon it in the appropriations, in view of its decreased and decreasing resources.

Further taxation is out of the question at this time, and should not be resorted to even if practicable. There is but one honest course left, and that lies in a general, radical change in the scale of official expenditure. This is our duty if we are true to those we represent, and the special mission of this House.

Our legislative system was modeled after the English system. England has her House of Lords, corresponding with our Senate; her House of Commons, corresponding with our House of Representatives. The government of England is no longer in the Crown, nor in the peers of the realm; it is in the people as represented in the House of Commons. So the Government of the United States is to-day, or ought to be, in the people; and so far as we here are faithful to the interests and liberties and rights of the people, here should be the power of the Government in controlling everything relating to the question of expenditures. Sir, the House of Commons fixes the budget; no House of Lords ever dared to make an issue with the House of Commons as to expenditures of the public money. The House of Lords does not amend a money bill coming from the House of Commons. The chancellor of the exchequer opens his budget; he presents to the House of Commons what, in his judgment, are the necessities of the government; he presents a detailed statement of the resources of the government; he makes his recommendation; the ministry support his recommendations, and the House of Commons vote upon it. Sometimes they modify, alter, and amend materially, but generally in the line of decrease, although I have known instances where the budget has been materially increased by the action of the House of Commons as against the ministry. Whatever that determination may be, when that budget is transmitted from the House of Commons to the House of Lords, it is adopted almost always nem. con. as a finality. Not so here, sir; and I hope my apprehension may not be realized that our house of lords will make issue with us at this time as to our budget on the question of economy. But if that issue shall come, I hope we will go before the people on it and let that court of final resort judge between us.

What has our Committee on Appropriations done? I said at the beginning of these remarks that our budget was nearly closed. The Committee on Appropriations has reported to the House the eleventh general appropriation bill. There remains but one more, and when that bill shall have been reported to the House we will have the entire amount of expenditure which the House of Representatives, so far as I know and believe, intend to allow for carrying on the Government during the next fiscal year.

I cannot say that I justify every detailed item of expenditure presented in these bills. I took exception originally to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations. I had grave doubts about the abolition of several consulships which under existing law certified to invoices of merchandise and had a material influence on the amount of duties to be collected under the ad-valorem system. I had my fears that the revenues of the country would be affected by the abolition of those consulates, and I looked upon the trifling expense involved in keeping them up as of little consequence compared with what, in my judgment, were larger and graver national considerations. I could go on and show particular items in other bills, isolated propositions, which of and by themselves I might have some doubts about, but the whole purpose, scope, and theory upon which these reductions of public expenditure have been made are in my judgment politic and wise, and we have no duty here on this side of the House except to stand by them as the declaration of a principle, as a practical, ever-living illustration of the truth of our professions to the people of economy and reform.

Now let us see what the Committee on Appropriations and this House propose in the way of reductions. It is well occasionally, and especially at this time, to take "an observation," in marine language, of the exact situation of the ship of state and how this House proposes to meet the existing deficiency in the revenues of the Government. I present a concise statement relating to each of the appropriation bills as reported from the committee, as acted upon by the House, and as compared with the estimates and the appropriations made by the last Congress for the same service:

Situation of the following-named bills, June 13, 1876.

SUMMARY.

The pension, fortification, and deficiency bills have become laws.

The consular and diplomatic and Military Academy bills are with conference committees.

The legislative, river and harbor, and post-office bills are before committees by reference of the Senate.

The naval bill has gone to the Senate committee.

The Indian bill is before the Senate committee.

The sundry civil bill is with the Committee on Appropriations, shortly to be reported to the House.

The Army bill is before the House.

The reduction made in the ten bills, as set forth in the foregoing pages, below the estimates amounts to	$37, 738, 705 38
Add to this the probable reduction on the two remaining bills, (Army and sundry civil,) say	20, 000, 000 00
Total as reduced below estimates	57, 000, 000 00
The reduction below the amounts appropriated for the present year	22 625, 840 00
Add to this the probable reduction on the two remaining bills	17, 000, 000 00
Total as reduced below appropriation for this year	39, 000, 000 00

In this way this House proposes to meet the deficiency. We believe it is necessary to meet that deficiency, not by borrowing, not by increase of taxation of the people, but simply by retrenchment. We think that reduction can be made without injury to the public service. We think the Government can be efficiently conducted with a very large reduction in each of the several branches; and I think I represent every gentleman upon this side of the House when I state that we have no disposition to embarrass the Administration. We do not wish to withhold a single dollar where that dollar is required for actual value rendered to the people who contribute that dollar, but we are resolved to make every effort to reduce the expenditures of the Government. Whether we will succeed or not, we must make the effort. While here and there there may be an item that might probably have been a little different, yet I take the ground that an aggregate reduction of over $40,000,000, which I have stated in detail, can be made and ought to be made for the relief of the people.

I believe, sir, from my experience and somewhat intimate knowledge of public affairs, that the machine might be run just as well, even better, by a more simple process at much less expense than this grand and magnificent affair that we now have, with its varied ramifications reaching every township and every voter of the country, and exercising an influence upon him in contradistinction to the true theory of self-government and the right of free opinion.

MILITARY POWER ANTAGONISTIC TO CIVIL POWER.

Now, with reference to the Army, my position and belief are, Mr. Chairman, republics have no necessity for standing armies. These institutions are inconsistent with the nature and theory of free opinion. The military power is one of force; it belongs to arbitrary rule. The civil power is one of thought; it belongs to the government of popular liberty, uncontrolled and untrammeled by other considerations than public good, as determined by the will of the people. Under our system the military is, or should be, subservient to the civil authority. The Army, as such, and those who control it, have no rights or privileges not accorded by the law, which itself is but the emanation of the people's voice.

And yet the military have never relaxed its effort to command a supreme power. Though not in fact even a necessary feature of government, it has always essayed not only to be permanently fixed as one but to be paramount to all others. In this country the War Department should have no existence except in time of war. It is not a requisite branch of the Government, as is generally conceded. It performs none of the legitimate functions of our Government in time of peace. It is inappropriate to such a period, having no uses, no duties, no affinity, or sympathy with the workings of a political institution founded on free opinion. It aids not in the execution of the laws, being foreign to the execution of any of the duties imposed upon the President. In time of peace neither the conduct of our relations with other governments nor the postal nor the internal nor the fiscal nor the judicial divisions of authority require the support of the military in the performance of the several duties devolving upon them.

For purposes of the protection of the merchant marine, a small naval force may be required; but, outside of a few cavalry upon the frontier and border settlements, I know of no necessity for military in the performance of the legitimate and proper functions of this Government.

Switzerland, our transatlantic sister-republic, has no war department and no standing army. She has no government troops, and needs none. If an emergency arises when an army is required, she draws upon the cantons (corresponding with our States) for their armed contributions, according to their population and means of furnishing them. I think it worthy of serious consideration whether we could not learn from their example and reform and re-organize our military system upon some such economical and simple plan. The arguments based upon the necessity for always being prepared for war in time of peace, and hence the reason for always maintaining an army, can have no force after the wonderful facility with which the Union forces were improvised, increased, and maintained in 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864. From a few thousand men, all told, at the beginning of the late civil war the world witnessed with intense interest the creation, as it were, within a month of one of the largest and best-equipped military forces ever gathered together upon a field of battle.

What has been done once in this country can be done again. If our people, who are by temperament and education of all others the best fitted naturally for soldiers, could thus so suddenly change their characters from civilians to warriors to suppress a domestic insurrection, with how much greater alacrity would they not mass themselves to meet a foreign enemy. We do not need the paraphernalia of war in times of peace, certainly not when the expense of its maintenance imposes so heavy a burden. Therefore, I am in favor of the reductions provided for in this bill. I voted for the bills recently passed by the House for a further re-organization and consolidation of this branch of the service. I am disposed to go yet further by abolishing the War Department as a Department of the Government and transferring the duties, under very greatly restricted regulations, to the Department of the Interior, as one of the bureaus of that Department. But as it is not likely so radical a change could be effected under existing circumstances, it appears to me even yet greater reforms can be made than has as yet been proposed.

The chief work of reform must be on the great establishments, because they are in excess of the public needs. The Army is too large. The cost of it is greater than the country can bear, with all the other burdens. It is high time the Army was put on the proper basis of a peace establishment, suited to a Republic whose aim, both at the first and now, was and is to relieve the people from oppressive and expensive government. Our doctrine, as Mr. Jefferson put it, ought to be settled by this time, "not to take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned," especially now when every industry of the country is suffering and prostrate, mainly, as wise men believe, from public debt and taxation.

Heretofore, in regard to a standing Army, we have held to republican principles. After the first war, which placed a free Republic among the nations, we disbanded the Army we had no longer need for. After the war of 1812 we maintained little more than the nucleus of a military establishment. Since the civil war we do not revert to republican practice. We do not relieve, as we might, the burdens of the people. The great debt of the war is and was larger than any nation ever accumulated in the same time. The great cost of the pension list, of the retired list, of the invalid soldiers worn out in public service, all that must be borne. But the standing Army, for active service after the war, ought to be no greater than is useful and necessary, and we ought to consider the proper use we have for it. We have not the use monarchies have for standing armies, to make war on our neighbors or to govern and oppress our people. In civil administration free government is all we need. We have no good use for soldiers to regulate popular elections, to organize legislatures, to administer laws. The only use we have for soldiers at all is to serve as a nucleus for organization and a protection for the Indian frontier. For this last, we need as little or less than twenty-five years ago. We have now industrious, prosperous, well-governed States, where then we had but frontier settlements. The Indian tribes are weaker, more peaceful, submissive. Railroads and improved communications give the means of moving troops for frontier police and give greatly increased effect to the same force. For frontier use and defense ten thousand men would seem sufficient. For the other uses of a standing Army, for military science and preparation, the Military Academy and a complete and well-instructed staff are sufficient, with the skill in arms, the intelligence, and warlike temper of our people.

Assuming these principles, the application of them is not difficult.

First. What need is there in peace for sea-coast garrisons? Fort-keepers under engineers would save the expense and take better care of the works. Two regiments of artillery are now employed for that purpose in New York and New England, two more from Baltimore to Pensacola. Those four regiments may be useful elsewhere; if not, they furnish occasion of a great retrenchment and an excellent economy.

Second. Worse than useless, very mischievous, are the garrisons and troops posted in the Southern States. Those reconstructed States, admitted to their place in the Federal Government, have State governments sufficient to their domestic tranquillity.

The soldier is no part of the republican institution for that work, and if employed in it is liable to misconceive his use and function; to conceive, like Sheridan, that he is to deal with the people as banditti. For the peace and good government of the country, and of the Southern States especially, as States of this Union, whose prosperity and wealth are part of ours, the soldiers there ought to be taken away and they ought to be disbanded; certainly they are not wanted there, even if they were as subordinate to the civil authority as the Constitution declares they shall be; even if their commanders had the dutiful respect and reverence for law that animated Washington and Jackson and Hancock.

If our Government is reconstructed; if we are the republic we were; if the methods of free government and legal administration are sufficient to us now, as before the war, we have no use for a larger standing army now than then. Some facts of detail may be suggested. Before the war the Army was about twelve thousand men, now it is twenty thousand. The cost then was fifteen millions a year; last year it was over forty-one millions. Look, too, at the list of officers; when the soldier is let go, the officer often continues to hold on under the plea of "organization," and of keeping on hand a proper amount of the "science of war." Our General and Lieutenant-General have held on, though admitted by the law to be useless and allowed "until a vacancy and no longer;" so says the act of 1870. This is a concession in the way of pension. Besides, there is the expense, with all the machinery of staff and headquarters. The official report of this expense is not quite explicit.

The General's salary is put at $13,500, with 40 per cent. added for service. House rent, fuel, and forage added to the 40 per cent. must run it up over $20,000. His aids, colonels, at $3,500 to $4,500 salary each, with fuel, quarters, forage for each, and cost of headquarters in cities, and clerks, make at least $30,000 more, or $50,000 in all. The Lieutenant-General and all his machinery must be put at least $30,000; say $80,000 per year for the two officers, for and during the incumbents. These officers, until a vacancy, are to "command the armies of the United States." The Constitution imposes this duty upon the President and no one else. That style and authority may do in war and with armies in the field. It is absurd in peace. Then, in every nation, the executive head of the nation, by a minister of war or government department, with subordinate bureaus, controls and directs the military administration—a function of government in peace. The General and Lieutenant-General, with headquarters in distant cities, are mere circumlocution and obstructions to the regular administration from the seat of Government.

Much rank in peace is bad provision for war. The ablest administrator among Napoleon's great soldiers has told of the incumbrance he found in his earlier wars. Even his all-controling hand could not restrain their jealousies, vanity, and contention.

The list of generals is too large. There were four before the war, there are now eleven. The staff corps has accumulated largely in numbers and rank. The adjutant-generals have gone up from fourteen to seventeen, the judge advocates from one to ten, the inspectors from two to eight, the quartermasters from thirty-seven to forty-eight, the commissaries from twelve to twenty-six, the doctors from one hundred and fifteen to one hundred and eighty-seven, the paymasters from twenty-eight to fifty-three, the engineers from ninety-one to one hundred and nine, the ordnance from thirty-four to fifty-three. There appears on the Army list twenty-eight chaplains; they may be useful in peace and war, but can be reduced fully one-half.

Am I not right, therefore, in asking an abolition of the whole system, or a material modification of it?

"The pomp and circumstance of glorious war" is as antagonistic to free government, founded on popular opinion, in time of peace as it is too expensive to be borne. Therefore, for these reasons, I am in favor of a general reduction of expenditures, a re-organization of the entire governmental routine, and a re-adaptation of the executive machine to the pure, cheap, and simple plan upon which it was constructed by our fathers. Why should all this splendid extravagance and immense array of the personnel of the official list be maintained any longer? I know how hard it is to reduce expenses once created and continued for a while, but the people have had to do so in their individual case, and I know no reason why the Government should not do so likewise.

Let this House, the popular branch of Congress, and which represents the great democratic party of the country, stand firm in its economy; and if the Senate, which, representing the republican party, chooses to place itself in a hostile attitude to this so much needed reform, the issue will be fairly joined, and we shall go before the people as the court of last resort to determine between us. I have no fear of the result.

A cause so just cannot fail, and we shall recover once more the possession of the people's power, to be used in their interest and for their welfare.

During the delivery of Mr. WOOD's remarks his time was extended, on motion of Mr. TUCKER, and the following proceedings took place:

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that a good many gentlemen desire to speak upon this bill. They cannot all speak to-day, and I believe it is agreeable to the Committee on Appropriations that the general discussion shall run both to-day and to-morrow, and that the next day we will take up the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KASSON. So that no business shall be transacted to-day or to-morrow?

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there be objection the Chair will regard that as the unanimous order of the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. On Friday morning I expect to explain the different sections of the bill, and may require rather more than five minutes to do so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We cannot make that order in Committee of the Whole. If it is necessary to make the order at all, the committee must rise and the proposition be made in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] yield for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will yield providing I do not lose any of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time will not be taken from the hour of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RANDALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that to-day and to-morrow be appropriated to the general discussion of the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the understanding be that to-day and to-morrow be devoted to general discussion upon the Army appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. Will that exclude us from making reports in the morning hour?

Mr. ATKINS. My motion is that general debate shall run to-day and to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The suggestion is that the sessions of to-day and to-morrow be devoted to general debate on the Army appropriation bill, and that no vote shall be taken on any proposition pending.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee to modify that proposition so as to allow us to make reports in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The very object of the gentleman from Tennessee is to avoid reports from committees and votes thereon during the morning hour which could be done otherwise than by this agreement.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will that exclude the Committee on Foreign Affairs from reporting?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that it will exclude everything.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Does it require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Does it exclude the morning hour entirely?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. ATKINS. Gentlemen know that the House is not full, and there would probably be no quorum here.

No objection being made, the understanding proposed by Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, then resumed and concluded his remarks.

THE SOUTHERN QUESTION.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the pending bill, but as the Army has a direct bearing upon southern affairs, I did not think it would be inappropriate for me to take advantage of this occasion to discuss in a general way what is commonly called "the southern question." It is a source of deep regret to me that this is still the most important question agitating the public mind. It is important, because it was out of the discussion of this question that sprang up some of the most serious political troubles that have occurred in this country since the organization of the Government. It is important, inasmuch as it was the immediate cause of the recent civil war, which cost the country many millions of dollars and thousands of lives. It is important, because the results of the late war were supposed to have been made secure under the system of reconstruction that was finally adopted.

In discussing this subject, I desire to have it understood that I speak not as a casual observer of passing events, but from thorough practical knowledge. It is a subject with which I am not only familiar in consequence of my identity with southern people and southern interests, as I understand them, but it is one which has occupied no little portion of my most serious consideration. The spirit of my remarks I hope will be such as will satisfy the House and the country that I am entirely free from passion and prejudice. Having been born upon southern soil and raised under the influences of southern society, it is nothing more than reasonable to suppose that I would have a very strong attachment for its people, even though I could not as much as respect some of its peculiar institutions. The peculiar relation which I occupy toward a large class of white citizens in my State makes it a source of deep regret to me to give utterance to some things which nothing but a sense of public duty would cause me to utter. But believing as I do that the best and truest friend that any people can have is the friend that will tell them of their faults as well as of their virtues, I shall proceed to discharge what I believe to be a plain duty, regardless of consequences personal to myself.

It is not my purpose to speak with a view of advancing the interest of the republican party, except so far as its interest may be advanced by the truth of history impartially told. It is a fact well known by those who are familiar with my public career thus far that I am not one of that number, if there be such, who are anxious that the republican party at the South or elsewhere should retain or regain its ascendency more in consequence of the demerits of others than any merit it may possess itself. I hope to see the day come when public opinion will be such that no party can be successful in the Government or in any State of this Union unless it deserves success. Although the republican party is not as free from faults as it should be, yet its claim upon the gratitude and support of the American people is sufficiently strong, in my judgment, to commend it to their approbation upon its own merits, and not as the least of two admitted evils. As anxious as I am that this great party shall remain in the ascendency in the Government, yet if I could be induced to believe that this ascendency can only be made an accomplished fact at the expense of good government, friendly and amicable relations between the different elements of which southern society is composed, and that democratic ascendency would bring about the opposite result, then I would be willing to at least try the experiment of a change. But I am thoroughly convinced that republican ascendency in the Government is not the cause of political troubles at the South, and that democratic ascendency is not the remedy for the evils thus complained of.

Nor am I one of that number, if there be such, who take pleasure in referring to political troubles at the South with a view of controlling public opinion at the North. It would be to me a source of personal pride and congratulation if I could declare upon the floor of the House of Representatives to-day that mob-law and violence do not exist in any part of the South and are not tolerated by any portion of its citizens. That circumstances are such that the facts would not sustain me in making this declaration is to me a source of deep mortification and profound regret. If the political troubles at the South were not unusual and exceptional, and were such as are common on excitable and extraordinary occasions, and would be just as likely to occur in one section of the country as in the other, for the purpose of preserving the good name of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent, as well as the section of country from which I come, I would cover them over with the mantle of charity rather than expose them to the public gaze.

The chief cause of political troubles at the South, in my judgment, is, as I have said on a former occasion, the result of the existence of a public sentiment which renders it necessary for the masses of the two races to identify themselves with two different political organizations and thus bring themselves into an apparent, if not real, antagonism with each other. Every sensible man must admit that, if, in any government, State, or community the material elements composing the society of which consist of different races, nationalities, and religions, political parties should be organized upon the basis of race, nationality, or religion, the result will be disastrous, not only to the parties to such a contest, but also to the entire community where such organizations may exist. It was certainly not the intention of the original advocates of the system of reconstruction that was finally adopted to make race or color the basis of political organizations at the South, but they evidently believed and were justified in believing that the incorporation of the colored element into the body-politic was not only essential to secure to the Government the fruits of its victory upon the field of battle, but that a combination of the Union and liberal element among the whites with that of the colored would be most certain to follow.

That the anticipations of those who thus believed have not been fully realized presents to the American people questions which demand the most serious attention and careful consideration of the statesmen of to-day. The causes that have conspired to prevent a realization of these anticipations and to keep up race organizations at the South are questions which I propose briefly to touch upon at this time.

There are in brief just two causes that have brought about this result: First, the continuous and unnecessary opposition of the Bourbon or impracticable element inside of the ranks of the democracy to the system of reconstruction that was finally adopted by Congress and a stubborn refusal to willingly and cheerfully acquiesce in the results of the war, (and this element has unfortunately controlled the democratic organization and shaped its policy;) second, the persistent and uncharitable opposition of the same element to the civil and political rights of the colored people.

I now ask the careful attention of the House while I enlarge somewhat upon these two points. I admit that the unconditional enfranchisement of the colored men at the South may have been brought about as much from necessity as from choice; yet, as I said before, no other plan, in my judgment, would have secured to the Government the fruits of its victory upon the battle-field. The success of the Johnson plan of reconstruction would not only have placed the colored man in a condition worse than abject slavery, but it would have restored to power and position in the Government the very class of men who inaugurated the rebellion and brought on the war. The loyal people of the nation saw the danger, and the cry came up from one end of the country to the other, "Give the colored man the ballot."

The colored was the only material element at the South that the country could depend upon. Although the masses of them were known to be ignorant, yet it was also known that they were true to their Government. Whatever else may be said of the colored man, it can never be truthfully said of him that he was ever disloyal to his Government or ungrateful to his friends, in consequence of which I feel justified in appealing to the generous heart of the American people. Condemn not the colored man for his unintentional mistakes when he has stood by you so firmly in the hour of need.

I see nothing in the congressional plan of reconstruction to condemn. The fact that the South is in an unsettled condition to-day is not the result of the adoption of that policy, but the fault is in the people of that section. The same conduct on their part would produce precisely the same results under any system. If the congressional plan of reconstruction is a failure in consequence of the opposition of those from whom opposition was expected, then the war was a failure, because the rebellion was crushed out by force, and not by the voluntary consent of the confederate authorities. To admit that a plan must be agreed upon that will be satisfactory to the Bourbon element at the South will be admitting everything for which the northern democracy contended in 1864.

The plan of reconstruction that was finally adopted was not only the policy of the republican party but it was also the policy of the Government, for it involved everything which was supposed to have been accomplished as the result of the war. The colored people, being loyal to the Government and friendly to its policy, aside from the fact that they were the immediate beneficiaries of that policy, could not be expected to identify themselves with an organization the aims, the purposes, the tendencies, and the public declarations of which were in opposition to that policy, even though they may have been assured that their right and privileges would not be interfered with. The loyalty of the colored man to his Government is not measured by his personal interest. Even to admit that the promises made by the democracy to the colored voters were made in good faith and would have been carried out, still the colored man would not have been justified in affiliating with that organization so long as its policy was in opposition to that of the Government.

But the opposition of the democracy to the policy of the Government would not bring about such disastrous results, but for the fact that this opposition is so intense and intolerant as to render independent action on the part of white as well as colored men almost an impossibility. Except in some counties and localities, the Bourbon element inside of the ranks of the democracy at the South controls that organization and shapes its policy, and as a natural consequence there is a morbid public sentiment which renders life, liberty, and property comparatively insecure. In consequence of this intolerance, colored men are forced to vote for the candidates of the republican party, however objectionable to them some of these candidates may be, unless they are prevented from doing so by violence and intimidation. White men are compelled to vote for the candidates of the democratic party, however objectionable to them some of these candidates may be, or else suffer the consequences of being outcasts from society and destroyed in business.

As the South was governed even for a number of years anterior to the rebellion by an aristocracy that was antagonistic to every principle of true republicanism, it is not strange that the public sentiment of that section should be hostile to the principles embodied in the system of reconstruction that was adopted by the Government. As republican governments can only be sustained by the public sentiment of the people, however strange it may seem to some or humiliating to others, it is a fact, nevertheless, that until there shall have been a revolution in public opinion at the South—until an honest difference of opinion upon public questions shall be tolerated in white and colored men alike—until malice, passion, and prejudice shall give way to reason, argument, and persuasion, civil governments in harmony with the system of reconstruction that was adopted by the General Government can only be sustained and upheld by the power of the General Government—the power that crushed out the rebellion. And yet to sustain or tolerate a governmental system at the South hostile or inimical to the principles embodied in the reconstruction acts of Congress will be to acknowledge practically that the war was a failure, and that the policy of the Government toward the Southern States has been from the beginning a mistaken one.

DEMOCRATIC OPPOSITION TO THE CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS OF THE COLORED PEOPLE.

The facts of history will bear me out in asserting that the repulsive attitude of the democratic party toward the colored man has had more to do with preventing the political affiliation of the two races than anything else; that united political action on the part of colored men has been and is still a matter of necessity in consequence of democratic opposition to them as a race and as a class is what every unprejudiced man must admit; that there is any necessity for united political action on the part of white men as such is what every fair-minded man must deny; that any considerable number of colored men can ever be induced to affiliate with the Democratic party of to-day is just as unreasonable as it is unnatural. Colored men can no more affiliate with the democratic party, as at present organized, than Catholics and foreign-born citizens could affiliate with the know-nothing party during the existence of that organization.

I can say to the democrats of the House and of the country, that the colored people are asking you every day to allow them to occupy an independent position in politics; to allow them to make their identification with a political organization a matter of choice and not of necessity; but thus far you have repulsed them on nearly every occasion. You tell them in nearly all of your political platforms; in nearly all of your leading papers; in nearly all of your political speeches; in nearly all of your political votes as members of Congress or of State Legislatures that they shall not be allowed to affiliate with any other than the republican party without self-humiliation and disgrace. I appeal to the leaders of the democracy in the name of humanity and justice, why continue this unjust, unnecessary, and uncharitable opposition to this powerless and defenseless race? You know that they are not your enemies; they do not seek to harm you, or to deprive any of you of any of the rights and privileges that you are entitled to under the Constitution and laws of the country. They have been and are still cultivating the soil of the southern portion of this great country, and have produced with their labor the wealth that many of you are enjoying to-day. And now, what do they ask or demand of you? Nothing but a fair chance in the race of life. Protection and security through a healthy public opinion in the enjoyment of their rights and privileges as American citizens. It is strange, remarkably strange, that the democratic party should maintain such persistent and uniform opposition to the colored people.

Shame upon this once grand, noble, and patriotic organization, that it has so degenerated that it can have no nobler aim, no grander object, no higher aspiration than the degradation, humiliation, and political subjugation of an innocent, harmless, powerless as compared with the whites, and inoffensive race. Well may we exclaim, Mr. Chairman, O, democracy, where is thy generosity, where is thy magnanimity! It is true that a number of the leaders of your party profess to be in favor of protecting the colored people in the enjoyment of their rights. A number of these gentlemen I believe to be honest and sincere in these professions; but it is an unfortunate, a lamentable, fact that every proposition that has been presented thus far having for its object the elevation, advancement, and promotion of the colored race in the scale of civilization and morality, as we understand it, has met with your solid, united, and unbroken opposition.

I listened carefully and attentively not long since to a very able and eloquent speech that was delivered by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in defense of the Indians, every word and sentence of which, so far as it related to the Indians, met with my hearty and cordial approval. But while he was delivering that speech this thought occurred to me: What a pity it is, how unfortunate it is, that some gentleman on that side of the House cannot be recognized as the advocate and defender of the colored race of America. So far as the gentleman from New York is concerned I have no hesitation in expressing it as my opinion that he personally wishes the colored people no harm. I look upon him as a kind, generous, benevolent man—as much so as it is possible for a democrat to be. But the aims, the purposes, and the tendencies of his party are such, the policy of his party is such, that he dare not stand upon the floor of the House of Representatives as the advocate and defender of the colored race of his country without placing himself in hostility to and in antagonism with the political organization with which he is at present unfortunately identified.

AN APPEAL TO REPUBLICANS.

To the republican members, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make what may be a final appeal. I use the word "final" because, as little as you may think of it, the condition of the colored people of the South to-day, if not of the whole country, is a seriously critical one. We are standing, as it were, upon the brink of our political and, I may add, personal destruction. When we look to the right, we find the angry billows of an enraged democracy seeking to overwhelm us. When we look to the left, we find that we are crushed to the earth, as it were, with an unjust and an unchristian prejudice. When we turn to the rear we find the assassin in certain portions of the country ready to plunge the dagger into our hearts for a public expression of our honest conviction. We turn our faces to you then as our friends, our advocates, our defenders, and our protectors.

Some of you may say that the colored man having been invested with the same political rights that are enjoyed by the whites he ought to be able to take care of himself. Plausible argument. To this we would have no objection if we were allowed to exercise and enjoy the rights and privileges thus conferred. But in some localities we are not. The democratic party has an armed military organization in several of the Southern States to-day called the White League. This organization has been brought into existence for the sole and exclusive purpose of accomplishing with the bullet that which cannot be accomplished with the ballot; for the purpose of controlling public opinion and carrying popular elections by violence and force of arms; for the purpose of destroying the freedom of speech, the freedom of opinion, the freedom of the press, and the protection of the ballot. Its mission is to accomplish practically within the Union that which could not be accomplished through the madness of secession. Not to establish an independent confederacy with slavery as its chief corner-stone, but, to use in substance the language of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] it is to crush out northern fanaticism at the South and to eliminate the negro from the politics of the country. The election held in my own State in November last is a striking illustration of the purpose for which this organization has been brought into existence.

But I do not propose to go into details upon that subject at this time. It is sufficient for me to say that that election was a sad and serious commentary upon our elective system and upon our republican form of government. Here is a State that would be just as certain to vote for the nominees of the Cincinnati convention in November next as any State in the Union if we could have toleration of opinion and a free, fair, orderly election. But under existing circumstances this State, with its known, acknowledged, admitted, unquestionable republican majority of from twenty to thirty thousand votes, will be just as certain to vote for the nominees of the Saint Louis convention as any State in the Union, simply because the republican organization has been crushed practically out of existence by the terrorism that has been inaugurated by this White-League organization. In several of the largest counties in that State to-day the republican party cannot as much as have an organized existence.

I ask the question in all seriousness, can the public sentiment of the country afford to sustain and tolerate this condition of affairs? If so, then the war was fought in vain and the billions of dollars spent for the preservation of the Union have been thrown away. To use the language of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] "the Union has only been restored in name, and the mighty conflict waged professedly to save it, a terrible and melancholy failure." We will have civil government in name but not in fact. I do not wish to be understood as endeavoring to convey the idea that all of the white people of my State who are not identified with the republican party are in sympathy with the White-League or Bourbon element; far from it. There is a large intelligent and respectable element among the whites of that State who are opposed to mob-law and violence and in favor of maintaining law and order and having every citizen protected in the enjoyment of his rights. It gives me pleasure to be able to bear testimony to the fact that there is not a more peaceable, orderly, and law-abiding people anywhere in the United States than those of the county and city in which I live. But, taking the State as a whole, it is an unfortunate fact that this liberal, moderate, conservative element is controlled and domineered over just as the Union element was in 1861.

I can fully recognize and appreciate the fact that there is a strong desire in the northern mind to blot out all of the unpleasant recollections engendered by the recent war. I am aware of the fact that there is a strong desire in the northern mind to have the issues growing out of the war dropped from the politics of the country. I confess that I share in this desire; for every man who knows anything about southern politics is aware of the fact that, if we ever expect to have a permanent republican organization in that section, it must be composed of men who fought the battles of the confederacy as well as those who fought the battles of the Union. And in this connection I will remark that the men who are instrumental in bringing into existence white leagues and other dangerous and mischievous organizations are not, as a rule, those who fought in the rank and file of either army, but they are men who never smelled powder in their lives, men who are particularly anxious to fight in times of peace but have no desire in that direction in times of war. While you are anxious to forget and forgive everything in connection with the war, let me admonish you, be careful that you do not allow your desire in that direction to become so intense as to render it possible for you to lose, practically, that which you are supposed to have accomplished as the result of the war.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I will say that the colored man does not ask his Government to protect him from violence as a colored man but as an American citizen. He does not ask to be protected in the right to vote the republican ticket, but to exercise the rights and privileges appertaining to American citizenship. It is a fact perhaps not generally known that the white man at the South who affiliates with the republican party, whether he be of northern or southern birth or whether he fought on the side of the Union or the side of the confederacy, is as much in need of this protection as the colored man. The colored man of the South appeals to the generosity of this great nation to-day to save him from personal if not political destruction. He appeals to the generous heart of what he believes to be a patriotic, just, and magnanimous people. He cannot believe that his appeal will be made in vain, but that the people of this great country will gratefully remember that, when the Union was threatened with dissolution, when the Constitution was ignored and the flag of the country was draped in mourning, the colored man remained true to his country, true to the Constitution, and loyal to the flag of his country.

In making this appeal, it is nothing more than proper that I should state, as one who knows whereof he speaks, that, if you should desert us in this the hour of our troubles; if you leave us to perish at the hands of those who seek our destruction for no other reason than because of our devotion to principle, if not loyalty to the Government, you will have destroyed our hopes, banished our ambition, crushed out our energies, and buried our aspirations beneath the sod of political degradation, to which you will have so ungenerously assigned us. That it is possible for the American people to be guilty of such ingratitude as this is what I will not believe until I am forced to do it. In considering this subject I hope you will be governed by the same motives that actuated Patrick Henry when he gave utterance to that noble and patriotic declaration, "Give me liberty or give me death."

I yield whatever remains of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining, which he yields to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.] In the absence of that gentleman, the floor is given to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAVAGE,] who has been recognized to follow the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Chairman, never having been a member of any legislative body until I took my seat as a member of the Forty-fourth Congress, I have heretofore felt that it were better for me to listen to others rather than to take an active part in the debates of this body, and in the opinion of many it may be that I am now too early in giving expression to my views. But it seems to me that the time has arrived when, without laying myself liable to the charge of egotism on the one hand or excessive modesty on the other, I can with propriety give expression to my views upon some of the important questions of the day. And right at the outset I feel compelled to find fault with the action of the party in the majority, of which I am one, and to me it is by no means a welcome task. This body, with an overwhelming democratic majority, has now been in session over six months, and, while they have done much worthy of commendation, candor compels me to say that they have fallen far short of what the country had a right to expect at their hands; not that I would charge the democratic majority with any acts of positive wrong, except as evil has resulted from their failure to act at all. Their sins are wholly of omission, not of commission.

In order that I may be properly understood, it will be necessary for me to indulge in a brief retrospective view of the country. At the close of the late war, a period of unexampled prosperity set in and continued for four or five years thereafter unabated and apparently without the slightest financial disturbance throughout our land. Notwithstanding the fact that the South at the close of the war was left prostrate and helpless, no sooner were the contending hosts on either side who were spared from the slaughter returned to the fields and the workshops than the reign of prosperity began, and the hum of the manufacturing establishments joined to the song of the plowman conspired to make the air vocal with the songs of peace and prosperity. All the laborers and mechanics of the country found employment without difficulty at remunerative wages; all of the manufacturing establishments in the country were run to their utmost capacity; the farmer sold all of his produce at fair rates; it would be but the literal truth to say that prosperity sat smiling at every door. Then it was that the ruinous policy of contraction was begun under the advice and threats of English capitalists, and has been since carried forward with merciless rigor, until it has bankrupted thousands of our manufacturers and deprived tens of thousands upon tens of thousands of our mechanics of their employment, and almost, if not quite, of daily food for themselves and their families. On the 31st of October, 1865, according to good authority, there was a circulating medium in the country of more than twice the volume that it is to-day, and which was confined almost wholly to the Northern States, by which I mean the States that were not engaged in rebellion.

Notwithstanding the addition of the Southern States, without a currency, with all of their industries paralyzed, their cotton fields idle, their laborers and mechanics almost in a state of starvation, the policy of contraction was steadily carried forward by the republican party until our available circulation was reduced to a sum not exceeding $638,000,000, less than one-half what it was for the Northern States alone at the close of the war. To this legislation has been added another law which now stands upon your statute-books, proposing to reach a specie standard by the year 1879, which, according to the best lights we have now, would reduce your circulating medium to the sum of about one hundred and fifty or two hundred millions of dollars, or to less than one-third what it is to-day.

I know that some of the leading republican speakers in Ohio last fall asked the question, "When did the republican party contract the currency?" And that in answer to the question they proceeded to show that the withdrawal of forty-four millions of the currency was accomplished by Secretary McCulloch during the administration of Andrew Johnson, but they neglected to tell the people that McCulloch was a legacy handed down to President Johnson by his predecessor, Mr. Lincoln, and that the withdrawal of that amount of currency was in pursuance of an act of a republican Congress, and that the republican party is, therefore, responsible for it. It will not do for the party who has been in unlimited control of the affairs of this Government for the past fifteen years to attempt to avoid responsibility for their acts by charging it to the administration of Mr. Johnson, who was himself elected by this same party. Indeed, some of the republican leaders go so far as to deny that there has been any contraction of the currency at all by the republican party. One instance which now occurs to me is that of a distinguished republican Senator, who denied in the most explicit manner that there had been any contraction of the currency at all, and charged that McCulloch retired all the compound-interest notes, time bills, and all interest-bearing and convertible bonds before Grant came into power, and he denied in the most emphatic manner that any of these securities ever at any time formed any part of the currency of the country, but that they were held exclusively for the accruing interest. The history of the country, however, shows that these interest-bearing bonds or notes almost exclusively took the place of the bank reserves, and to that extent at least answered the same purpose to the country as currency, by allowing the currency itself to be turned loose to circulate among the people. It is likewise equally true that, whenever there was any occasion for their use, these interest-bearing notes were actually circulated as a currency. I have seen them in circulation, and I have no doubt but what every member of this House has also seen them actually performing the office of money.

To show that I am not mistaken as to these interest-bearing notes and bonds being considered as a part of the currency of the country, I quote from the message of President Grant of December 1, 1873. He said:

> During the last four years the currency has been contracted, directly by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and 7.30 bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves to the extent of $63,000,000.

Two most singular misapprehensions of the distinguished Senator to which I have alluded will be exposed by an examination of this quotation from the President's message. The Senator says "they did not form any part of the currency, but were held for the accruing interest." The President says the currency was contracted by their withdrawal. The Senator says, and I use his exact language, "these were all retired by McCulloch and before Grant came into power." Grant says that to the extent of $63,000,000 they had been withdrawn "during the last four years" and that to that extent at least they were "outstanding on the 4th day of March, 1869," which was the date of the commencement of his first term.

The Senator further denied that resuming specie payment in 1879, according to the legislation of the last Congress, would contract the currency; but, on the other hand, claimed that the great body of our currency could be floated at par with gold. I had heretofore taken it for granted that our republican friends expected to confine the people strictly to a "hard-money" currency, or if a paper currency be issued, that, like Amasa Walker, they would say, "No issues should be made except upon specie in hand." I supposed they would not dare to come before the people and say that they were in favor of a return to the old system of banking upon a specie basis; for the people of this country never want to see the day again when we have a paper currency like that of 1857, which amounted to between fifteen and sixteen dollars per capita, with but $2 in specie to redeem it. But here is substantially the old system proposed by this distinguished financier of the republican party. About the only difference is that we are to have national instead of State banks. The proposition is to attempt to float between seven and eight hundred million dollars of redeemable paper upon a basis of $150,000,000 in gold. Wherein does this proposition of the Senator differ from the old wild-cat system? And what prevents a run being made upon the banks, and consequent failure to pay, and the ever-recurring result—a panic? So long as your banks are permitted to issue five or six dollars in paper to one of specie in hand there will always be panics whenever there is a run made upon them, and, to my mind, it is folly to expect anything else. The Senator also proposes to put the United States Treasury in the same dangerous condition as the banks, that is, they are to have United States Treasury notes outstanding payable on demand in gold to the extent of five or six dollars to one in gold in the Treasury to redeem them, and of course their legal-tender quality will be taken from them, notwithstanding his views to the contrary. It does not require a person of very great genius to see that, in case a run should be made upon the Treasury for payment or redemption of the outstanding notes, the United States, just like any other corporation doing a banking business, would have to suspend. In the event of such a contingency arising, I would like to ask some who favor this financial scheme about how much below par, in their opinion, these notes would sink?

It seems to me that the proposition to return to a specie standard involves one of two things: either a return to hard money or paper issued dollar for dollar, or a return to the old system of banking, or one in substance the same. To the second alternative I am opposed. Neither do I believe that the people of the United States will ever consent to a return to that iniquitous system of robbing the many for the benefit of the few. In the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency he makes use of this language:

> The experience of this country, previous to the organization of the national banking system, has shown that in twenty years an amount equal to its whole banking circulation was lost in the hands of the people, the loss by bills of broken banks alone being computed to have been at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

With this showing before them I do not think the people of this country ought to be in great haste to return to a system of banking on specie such as we are invited to by this republican party legislation.

We hear a great deal of talk about "honest money" among a certain class of politicians, but for one I do not want any more of that class of honest money, that one-twentieth of the entire circulation of the country becomes entirely worthless in the hands of the people each year, their loss being pocketed by that class of bankers who are not above playing the knave by enriching themselves at the expense of their less-favored neighbors. And not only a twentieth, but in some years, according to this same authority, the people who are compelled to handle this money have been known to suffer a loss of one-fifth of the entire bank capital of the country. Who is there among the business men of the country that is willing or desirous to return to specie payment unless some system can be devised that will promise better results than those given by the Comptroller of the Currency? And what better system can be devised while you have but $150,000,000 gold in the country to form that basis of which we hear so much talk? It is not a specie basis to which you are invited to return, for you cannot return to that which you never had, and I affirm that you never had in this country a specie basis in the true sense of those words; but, on the contrary, four-fifths of your circulation, in many instances before the war, was built upon credit, and credit alone, there not being more than one dollar in coin in the vaults of the banks to redeem five of the paper dollars that were in circulation, and that on their face purported to be redeemable in coin, but which every man of sense knew to be a glaring falsehood. It seems to me, therefore, unless we have deliberately determined to return to the old credit system of banking, that it is scarcely less than criminal to talk of a return to a specie basis, so long as our supply of specie is so limited as at present.

President Grant in his message in 1873, speaking of the currency, uses this language:

> In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year.

If Grant was right in using this language when we had over six hundred millions of currency, what shall we think of the party which proposes, notwithstanding constant increase of population, to reduce our circulation to less than two hundred millions? I do not wish to be understood from what I have said as being opposed to a specie standard when that can be reached without bringing bankruptcy and ruin in its train. On the contrary, I would be glad to see the day when we can adopt a specie standard without injury to the manufacturing and producing classes of our country. And I would not willingly do any act that would put off that desirable day. But I do not believe a specie standard can be reached until our exports are sufficiently increased to pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations, and at the same time have an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in our country. And I believe with President Grant, as expressed in his message before quoted from, that—

> To increase our exports sufficient currency is required to keep all the industries of the country employed. Without this, national as well as individual bankruptcy must ensue.

I am therefore in favor of the adoption of some plan by which the volume of currency will be regulated by natural laws and will always correspond with the demands of trade, and not be left to be constantly tampered with according to the whims of partisan politicians or the bankers and money-lenders of the country.

I am in favor of the immediate and unconditional repeal of that stupendous folly of the republican party known as the specie-resumption act; and what is the most surprising thing to my mind is the fact that, although there is a democratic majority in this House of nearly two-thirds, and petitions and letters have poured in upon us by the thousand begging and praying for its repeal, it still stands upon our statute-books untouched even by the action of this House. Why is this? It is not because there are any democrats here who are in favor of this law; for in my opinion there are not a dozen of the majority in this House who would say that if that law was now pending before this House they would support it. We know as a matter of history that every democrat in both branches of Congress voted against it, and that it was put through under the whip and spur as a party measure in order to bridge over the presidential election. And we honor that noble band of democrats who, though in a minority, yet stood up with a united front against its original passage. Once at least, if not twice, a proposition for its repeal has received a majority vote in this House; but in consequence of not having been reported by a committee, it failed to pass for want of a two-thirds vote in its favor.

I am told by those having experience in these matters that in days gone by a majority vote in favor of a proposition has been taken as instructions by the committee having the matter in charge; and that in consequence such committee always reported a bill in accordance with the views of the majority as expressed by a vote in the House. But not so with our Committee on Banking and Currency. They seem to be determined to prevent its repeal; and why? Is it because they think it is a good law? I do not think so; for I do not believe there is a democrat on that committee who would not say that he thought it ought to be repealed; but when you ask them why they do not report a bill for its repeal, you will be told that while they favor its repeal, they think something should be substituted in its place, and that the democrats cannot agree upon a plan for resumption to take the place of this republican plan which it is proposed to repeal.

In God's name, gentlemen, if you mean what you say, and you are really in favor of the repeal of this iniquitous law, why not report your bill for its unconditional repeal, and discuss your substitute afterward; or do you mean to hold the present law over our heads as a means of driving gentlemen who hold the same views that I do into the support of measures for specie resumption dictated by the bondholders of the East, and but little if any improvement upon the present law? If such is your intentions, I serve notice on you now that you will have to wait until you get a Congress composed of different men than the present. We do not propose to be driven by a small minority of the democrats on this floor into the support of any scheme which would involve the destruction of the dearest rights of our constituents, and the dishonor of ourselves as their representatives on this floor. No, gentlemen; if that is your plan you might just as well abandon it at once, and not wait until you are driven to do your duty by the uncontrollable force of public opinion. If you persist in your refusal to do that which the plainest dictates of common justice requires at your hands, you will be repudiated by the people whom you have betrayed, as you will richly deserve to be. I speak now to the democratic majority on this floor, for it is to them that the people look for relief in this matter. Will you continue to refuse to do that which in your hearts you confess ought to be done merely for the purpose of forcing upon us a measure which you know would receive no support upon its own merits? Or will you not rather like honest men, as you are, come forward and repeal this law and then submit your plans and let them stand or fall by their merits or demerits as independent measures? Give us a chance to have a square vote upon the repeal of this law, and then do not complicate it with any proposition for forced resumption of specie payment. You cannot bring about specie payments by acts of Congress before the business interests of the country are ready for it, and to my mind it is utter madness to attempt it. All such attempts will be futile and will end in the bankruptcy and ruin of thousands of our most enterprising business men, who are more or less involved and are now straining every nerve to keep up. On the other hand, whenever we are in a condition to maintain specie payment, after we have resumed it will take but little legislation to bring about the resumption, and I am one of those who do not wish to undertake to resume until we are in a condition to maintain resumption.

There is another subject closely allied to this which I wish to consider briefly.

The democracy of Ohio have placed themselves upon the record in favor of the withdrawal of the present national-bank circulation and the issuing of legal-tender currency in its stead. Is not this proposition one that is eminently just to the people of this country? I know we are told by some of the leading radical speakers and journals that the legal-tenders are simply "irredeemable rags," and but little, if any, better than confederate scrip. I know also that these speakers and journals only a few years ago charged every one with disloyalty and treason who dared even to intimate a doubt as to the propriety of making greenbacks a legal tender. Notwithstanding all this, I am unable to see any reason why the legal-tenders are not as good as national-bank money which is redeemable in legal-tenders, and if by substituting the money in which the national-bank money is redeemable we can save from eighteen to twenty million dollars a year to the people, I am in favor of the substitution. I do not object to the national-bank currency because it is not a safe currency; on the contrary, I regard the currency of the national banks as perfectly safe; but I see no good reason why the people of this country should pay eighteen or twenty millions each year to the bankers of the country for a currency which is in no respect better than one they can obtain without any of that outlay.

Now, how is this most reasonable proposition met by the republican party and those democrats who belong to the national banks of the country? Why, we are told that under the pledge contained in the act of 1864 we are limited to the sum of $400,000,000, and that it would be a violation of the plighted faith of the nation if a single dollar beyond that amount should be issued. Now, if gentlemen who make this objection are right in their views of the law, it must be confessed that this is an insuperable obstacle in the way of ever carrying into effect the change proposed by the Ohio democracy, unless they avoid the force of the objection by substituting a currency such as was proposed by the bill offered by Mr. Beck, of Kentucky, in the Forty-third Congress; that is, to give the Treasury notes exactly the same qualities as a circulating medium that is now possessed by the national-bank circulation, and not make them legal tenders. But the Ohio democracy say they are in favor of "the gradual but early substitution of legal-tenders for national-bank notes." Without considering whether it was wise to declare that the Treasury note to be substituted for the national-bank note should be a legal tender, I propose to briefly consider the question as to whether under the legislation of Congress we are prohibited from issuing legal-tenders in excess of $400,000,000 for the purpose of supplying the place of the present national-bank currency. The law which it is claimed contains the limitation is in these words:

Nor shall the total amount of United States notes issued, or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum not exceeding $50,000,000 as may be temporarily required for the redemption of the temporary loan.

Now, if it can be shown from the reading of this law, and from the circumstances under which it was enacted, that it was the intention of the Congress which enacted it, and that the only construction of the law is to limit all future Congresses in their power to enact a law for the issuing of legal-tenders, no matter what may be the circumstances, to the sum of $400,000,000, and not merely to limit the officers of the United States under the laws then in force. I say in my opinion if this could be shown it would demonstrate in the most palpable manner the unconstitutionality of the law. For if under the Constitution Congress has the right to make Treasury notes a legal tender, no act of one Congress can take that right away from another. In other words, one Congress cannot limit the constitutional rights and powers of another. I am not now discussing the question as to whether Congress has the right to make anything else besides gold and silver a legal-teader; or whether, if they have that right, it is confined exclusively to times of great public emergencies, as some gentlemen have claimed; but I am taking it for granted that at least under some circumstances they have that right, and from that I deduce the proposition that whenever those circumstances arise Congress has the right and power to provide for their issue, without regard to any past legislation of any former Congress or of the same Congress. And if the Congress which enacted this law attempted any such thing as to put a limitation upon the power of future Congresses, they went beyond their constitutional power and the act to that extent is null and void. But I maintain that no such intention as that of limiting the constitutional powers of future Congresses existed at the time of the passage of this law, but the evident intention was to limit the United States officers, who were charged with the duty of issuing these notes, in the amount to be issued under and by virtue of the laws in force at that time. I am sustained in this conclusion by the construction which Congress and the people have put upon a similar statute. In February, 1862, Congress enacted a law containing this proviso in relation to the legal-tenders and demand notes:

That the amount of the two kinds of notes together shall at no time exceed the sum of $150,000,000.

This language, I might say is equally as comprehensive as that contained in the act of 1864. Yet the same Congress which enacted this law, containing this positive language, in less than ninety days thereafter passed another law in which they authorized the issuing of one hundred and fifty millions more, making the aggregate $300,000,000. They must have construed the act of 1862 as I construe that of 1864, or else they willfully and knowingly violated the plighted faith of the nation to the holders of the first one hundred and fifty millions. And if Congress had a right to construe the act of February 25, 1862, as not in any manner limiting their rights, then plainly the same construction can and ought to be placed upon the act of 1864. And in my opinion the forced construction which has recently been put upon that act would never have been heard of had it not been that over four hundred millions of concentrated bank capital is interested in having that construction adopted as the true one. And by the powerful influence of this net-work of banks, primary elections and conventions of the people are manipulated, and men are set up and pulled down almost at their will, and by their well-organized lobby the very fountains of legislation have been corrupted, and the people are groaning to-day under an increased weight of taxation as the result. And unless the people rise in their might and hurl from power the party which has betrayed their trust, they will find that their trials and hardships have but just begun.

There are many objectionable features in the present banking system, some only of which I have time to notice. From the returns made on the 12th day of September, 1873, which was about one week prior to the money panic of 1873, we learn the astounding fact that the banks of this country were drawing interest upon nearly $714,000,000, more than their entire capital, including surplus fund and undivided profits. On this vast sum of money the banks were drawing interest, when in reality they were not the owners of one dollar of it. Is it any wonder that they should be able to declare large dividends, when they were receiving interest upon all of their capital and upon seven hundred and fourteen millions in addition thereto?

This sum if loaned at but 5 per cent. shows that the banks draw from the laboring and producing interest of the country each year more than $35,000,000, for which they return no equivalent whatever. Here is an abuse which calls loudly for correction; but I despair of being able to accomplish anything in the way of legislation looking to the relief of the country from this incubus, so long as one branch of Congress contains a majority of their avowed champions and the other has so many who are afraid to have the money power arrayed against them in their congressional districts. I despair of having any legislation on this subject until the people speak to their representatives in tones which cannot be misunderstood. Then, and not till then, will there be legislation abridging the almost unlimited power of this gigantic monster, which has grown up in our midst almost imperceptibly, and which is stealthily sapping the very foundations of our Government.

But it is said that they are entirely safe, and that the people will never lose any of their money by broken banks so long as they furnish the circulation. That is true so far as their circulation is concerned, but, managed as they have been in the past, I deny that they are anything else than the fruitful source of money panics, just such as we witnessed in September, 1873. Let us take their condition at that time and see what chance there was for them to have done otherwise than they did do.

Their immediate liabilities were as follows:

Bank-notes outstanding	$339,081,799
Individual deposits	622,685,563
United States deposits	7,829,327
Deposits by United States officers	8,098,560
Total immediate liabilities	977,695,249

Their immediate resources were as follows:

Legal-tenders	$92,347,663
Specie	19,868,469
United States certificates of deposits	20,610,000
Total immediate resources	132,826,132

It will be observed from these statistics that the banks were in condition to redeem but 13 or 14 per cent. of the amount they had outstanding, and which was liable to be called for at any moment. When there was a run made upon them of course they could do nothing but suspend; and, as we all recollect, they did suspend.

I do not pretend to be able to furnish a remedy for all of these evils, but that such evils exist is patent to the most casual observer, and much would be accomplished in the way of remedying them by cutting off the right of the banks to issue a currency and by confining them to a legitimate banking business and by restoring the circulating medium to the Government, where it should have been from the commencement. Why should these national banks throughout the country have any more right to issue a currency than any of the thousands of other banks who aid in carrying on the commercial transactions of the country, without this prerogative, which really belongs to sovereignty and ought never to have been delegated by the Government to any private corporations? I have no disposition to quarrel with the banks or to take any rights away from them which justly belong to them. They are necessary institutions in a great commercial country such as ours, and no one but a fool would wish to cripple their necessary functions. But the prerogative of issuing a currency is no part of the necessary functions appertaining to the banks, and I am decidedly in favor of lopping it off at as early a day as practicable, without deranging the business interests of the country, and returning it to the Government, where it legitimately belongs.

I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. I would inquire of the Chair how much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has thirty minutes of his time yet unexpired, which he has yielded to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COOK. Inasmuch as it is now five o'clock, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. REAGAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PAYMENT TO WIDOW OF DECEASED MEMBER-ELECT.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution to which I think there can be no objection. It is in relation to the pay of a deceased member.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be directed to insert the following item in the bill making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the widow of Garnet McMillan, late Member-elect of this House from the ninth district of Georgia, a sum equal to the salary of a member of Congress for three months, being the sum of $1,250.

Mr. HOLMAN. That may be all correct, but I think the resolution should not be imperative.

Mr. HILL. I have copied precisely the form of a similar resolution adopted during this present session.

Mr. RANDALL. This is not properly an item for the sundry civil bill. This payment should come out of the contingent fund.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the resolution were made one merely of inquiry, it might be taken into account in determining what the amount of the contingent fund shall be. But this resolution as now drawn leaves no discretion with the committee as to the form in which this should be passed. I suggest to the gentleman that he simply direct the committee to inquire into the subject.

Mr. HILL. Very well. As I have stated, this is copied precisely from a resolution adopted during this session of Congress. But I am willing that it shall be modified so as merely to direct the committee to inquire.

Mr. RANDALL. Did we not agree to transact no business?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is the order of the House that no business shall be transacted to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that that is the order of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. We may let this resolution go, if it be made one of inquiry merely; but I submit for the future, while this order is in operation, we cannot even by unanimous consent transact any business.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I would like to hear the resolution read as it is proposed to modify it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Committee on Appropriations inquire into the propriety of inserting the following item in the sundry civil appropriation bill, &c.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was given to Mr. NORTON for eight days.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CATE obtained leave to print in the RECORD, as part of the debates, some remarks he had prepared in regard to commercial relations with Canada. [See Appendix.]

And then, on motion of Mr. COOK, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of B. Kittredge & Co. of Cincinnati, John L. Moore's Sons of New York, and other wholesale dealers in military and sporting arms in Saint Louis, New Orleans, and Philadelphia, declaring that new and good arms issued by the General Government to the States for the armament of the militia, bearing the inspection mark of the Government, have been thrown upon the market in the city of New York, and other places, and asking for such legislation as will prevent the executives of States from selling arms issued for the armament of the militia, to the Committee on the Militia.

By Mr. BOONE: The petition of citizens of Trigg and Lyon Counties, Kentucky, that the tariff laws remain unchanged, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CHAPIN: The petition of Jonas A. Champney and 60 others, for one condemned cannon and two cannon-balls for ornamenting the burial ground at South Adams, Massachusetts, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HOLMAN: Memorial of P. R. Sawyer, of Madison County, Illinois, against the squandering of the public lands, against a monopoly of said lands or in the finances of the country, and against favoritism in legislation, to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of citizens of Jackson County, Indiana, for the restoration of the pension of George Green, a soldier of the Mexican war, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of architects of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, that House bill No. 2328 be amended so as to include the public buildings of the District of Columbia in its provisions, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. ROBERTS: The petition of Margaret Kenah, widow of Patrick Kenah, Company D, First United States Artillery, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania: Remonstrance of Henry Rowe, George C. Rowe, Thomas Lindsey, Edmund Burke, and 160 others, against the reduction of import duties upon foreign goods which enter into competition with their respective manufactures, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. WAITE: The petition of William H. Latham, for an honorable discharge as an acting volunteer lieutenant in the Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The following petition was presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule without having indorsed thereon the name of any member of the House, and referred as stated: The petition of citizens of Webster County, Iowa, that the United States Supreme Court be requested to cause to be issued by the Federal courts of Iowa a general injunction restraining all persons from mining, or any other operation whatever, save and except the cultivation of the soil by the actual settlers on all so-called Des Moines River land in Iowa, to the Committee on Public Lands.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 14, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that by the order made yesterday by unanimous consent this day is to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill; that there will be no morning hour, and no other business will be transacted.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] in one portion of his remarks when about to introduce his request to make the order, said this:

On Friday morning I expect to explain the different sections of the bill, and may require rather more than five minutes to do so.

I merely want to ask for information whether he did not mean on Thursday morning, that is, to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair presumes that the gentleman meant that the debate under the five-minute rule should proceed to-morrow. This day is exclusively for general debate on the Army bill.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

CURRENCY.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few reflections on those subjects usually embraced in the term "currency," and in doing so I shall not be vain enough to assume the power of declaring to this House any new principle of finance or any new fact in history. I shall content myself with such impressions of my subject as the average business, not scientific, citizen usually receives and retains. I shall avoid all technicalities and all appearances of a scientific disquisition and shall treat my subject in a practical way.

It must be evident to all that the more learned and scientific our financial doctors are the greater is their difference, and the less hope of an agreement among them.

A casual survey of the condition of the people and Government of the United States does not produce the most encouraging impressions. The cry for relief to Congress comes from every section of this great country, from every industry, and from every grade of human life. The distress is paralyzing the manufacturer, the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, and the laborer; and, so far from touching the bottom of this financial quicksand and re-ascending, it seems as if we were sinking deeper and deeper, and our condition becoming gradually worse and worse.

The close of the war found us in possession of an inflated and depreciated currency, (amounting to $1,152,914,892,) and, measured by it, the value of all kinds of property and the price of every description of labor ruled high in amount. Confidence in the final redemption of the currency was then wanting, and this feeling of insecurity produced a general desire to exchange it for property and thereby preserve its value. Then, the passion for speculation and accumulation of wealth, created during the war, was universal and irresistible. Our people had become extravagant and reckless. This state of things was soon followed by a practical reduction of the amount of legal-tender notes, and so continued until the amount was reduced to less than four hundred millions. A general shrinkage of the value of property and a general reduction in the price of labor were experienced throughout the entire country. Confidence in the ability and intention of the Government and people to discharge the national debt was established on a firm basis. To these great and rapid changes may be added the fact that since 1863, and during this period, the currency has been gradually yet surely concentrating at a few great money centers, producing as a natural result a scarcity of money at other points, a shrinkage of values, the destruction of individual and mutual confidence, the hoarding of currency, and the prostration of all kinds of business and occupations, resulting in a general outburst from the people for relief. Incident to this state of distress may be mentioned the fact that, since 1860, there has been a large increase of national and State indebtedness over the increase of population. The taxes of the United States, individual States, counties, and municipal corporations are fivefold what they were in 1860, while our population has not increased in proportion. These facts, considered in connection with the disastrous depreciation of property everywhere, show the real condition of the country in a strong but faithful light. Our people are overburdened with taxes; their earnings are absorbed and their hopes and energies are paralyzed by them.

Believing, at the time, that the condition of our industries was owing in part to the want of a sufficient and flexible circulating medium, early in the session I introduced a bill to repeal the tax of 10 per cent. on the issue of State banks and private bankers. I was induced to believe if this were done we could retain in our several States a domestic or local currency that would supply our necessities and afford us some relief. I felt and believed then that such a local circulation would have the same relative value and be controlled by the same general financial laws that operate upon our national paper currency; that such currency would remain at home in circulation among our people and would not be carried away; that it would be treated by the people of our sister-States just as our national currency is treated by the people of foreign countries. I followed my bill into the committee-room of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and while that committee of intelligent gentlemen did me the honor of a patient hearing, they failed to be impressed with the merits of my scheme of relief, and my bill slumbers on the Speaker's table.

Such, then, are the conditions and necessities of our people and country, and the question naturally arises, what can and shall be done by Congress to secure relief? To stand still is to see the ship sink without an effort to save it. To furnish relief is to save the ship. Destruction will follow if nothing is done, and it can only follow if we attempt and fail.

While the absence of currency is paralyzing the energies of our people, it must be apparent that the amount of coin and currency is either insufficient in volume or, if sufficient, it has ceased to circulate as a medium of exchange.

The circulation at present may be estimated as follows:

Old demand and legal-tender notes	$370,596,038
Fractional currency	40,860,039
National-bank notes, 10th March, 1876	341,000,000
Coin, (estimated)	200,000,000

To say nothing of the value of the property which is transferred annually, our yearly products alone exceed in value $8,000,000,000, a bare statement of which shows that every dollar of coin and currency now in the country must be actively employed, with the aid of checks and drafts, to meet the necessities of Government and trade. That this volume of coin and currency is more than sufficient for such purposes I am not prepared to admit, and so long as I am not satisfied of this fact I shall feel it my duty to oppose a further reduction of our legal-tender currency. That there is an amount of coin and currency in the country sufficient to meet the requirements of Government, the exigencies of commerce, and the necessities of the people may well be doubted. The history of the past ten years is the history of contraction of currency and exportation of coin, and during the whole period, as a natural consequence, we have seen our property shrink in value until it has become almost unsalable.

As the South and West are without coin or currency, and while the business of these sections languishes for the want of both, and as it is apparent that there is a vast amount in existence, the question naturally arises, Where is this currency? In what is it employed? And the answer to all this is found in the newspapers every day. The great money centers of the country have absorbed it; and to-day currency is stacked up in the vaults of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston unemployed and without demand. Currency can be had to-day in Wall street at the lowest possible rates of interest; as low as 2 per cent. per annum on Government securities, while at the South it cannot be had at 20 per cent. on our landed property. These vast sums so held at these money centers may be considered as retired and destroyed, so far as we are concerned. We have but little credit, and what little we have is likely to be destroyed by politicians. We have but a small number of Government securities, and the money kings of the North have no confidence in the present or prospective value of our landed property. Indeed, the present hoarding of currency is the very worst of all practical schemes for retirement and contraction. It is of no service to the banker who holds it and none to the farmer, merchant, or mechanic, who are being ruined for the want of it; and if this vicious practice is persisted in, it may at no very distant day imperil the credit of the Government itself. A point may be reached where the Federal Government, as in some Southern States, may be compelled for the want of currency to accept property in lieu of taxes.

This monetary condition of the country flows directly from the national act compelling resumption on the 1st day of January, 1879, and must continue to exist until that time is reached or until that act is repealed, speculation in legal-tender and national-bank notes by hoarding them till the date of resumption must cease, and this evil can only be cured by one of two remedies:

First. By redeeming the legal-tenders at once in coin or by receiving them in payment of all customs and dues to the Government, and, if this be impracticable, then,

Secondly. By repealing the resumption act immediately.

The effect of this legislation will be to take away the inducement to hold such notes, and, as a natural consequence, they will flow out of their places of concealment and seek profitable investments in property, in business, and in the securities of the country.

The present value of legal-tender notes as compared with gold is about eighty-seven cents on the dollar. The day fixed for resumption by law is January 1, 1879, less than two years and eight months hence. Now, if this promise by the Government is carried into practical effect, it is clear that the present holder will realize the difference between the value of a dollar in currency now and the value of a dollar in gold then, a difference of at least 13 per cent. The holders of such notes have only to keep their bills until the date of resumption and realize a greater profit or interest than can be obtained at the present time by loans on Government securities, and this without any risk whatever. The law of resumption actually offers a premium to those who will hoard their currency, when the inducement should be strong enough to draw them out for circulation. In view of the prospective action of this law, our national banks, too, are hoarding their legal-tender notes and retiring their own issue; for when the Government resumes they also must resume in coin or legal-tender notes. These notes, therefore, are gold for their purposes. The retirement of their own bills now, at a time of depreciation, is a decided advantage to them; but it is another inducement to injure the business of the whole country by an ill-timed contraction.

It is said, and in high official circles too, that it is impracticable to resume at once, for the best of reasons: we have no gold; and this seems to be true; for on the 24th of February last the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution introduced in the House by Mr. SAYLER, said the amount of gold then in the Treasury subject to the redemption of legal-tender notes was $13,341,423.76; that the whole amount on hand that day was $91,987,028.17; all of which was appropriated to other and legitimate claims, except the above sum of $13,341,423.76; and as the Government is obliged to have from ninety to one hundred millions of gold annually to meet interest demands, customs duties, now receivable in gold, cannot be accepted in legal-tender notes. As it is impossible to resume specie payment at once and impracticable to receive legal-tenders for customs duties at this time, it also seems clear that we shall not be able to do so by January 1, 1879. To accomplish this great feat we will have to pay off the legal-tenders, fractional notes, cancel national-bank notes, and pay all maturing claims in gold coin in two years and a half. The coin interest, $95,152,845.90, must be paid in six semi-annual installments of $47,576,422.50 each up to January 1, 1879, equal to $285,458,537.70; interest on $500,000,000 of new bonds at 5 per cent. for two years and a half, $62,500,000; amount of legal-tender and fractional currency to be redeemed in coin, $413,428,542; making the vast sum of $761,387,079.70 in coin, and to be raised and paid within two years and a half.

Now, to raise this gold, to meet such demands, it will be necessary to issue new bonds—exchange these bonds for gold—then the gold for greenbacks. Thus indirectly funding the entire legal-tender issue; thus retiring from circulation over three hundred and seventy millions of legal-tender notes, and by such means change a debt which bears no interest now to one that will. It would seem that the substitution of gold for greenbacks would not affect the monetary volume, that the amount would remain unchanged. But, when it is remembered that we are exporting coin by millions, we will soon see that the gold we draw from Europe for one purpose will be returned to Europe for another. Thus, without State and private banks; without a legal-tender circulation; with national-bank notes driven to their vaults, and specie exported from the country—our condition, bad as it now is, will be worse then.

To resume coin payment now is impossible; to resume January 1, 1879, impracticable. But while this is true I insist that we can, and in justice should, make our legal-tender issue receivable for all taxes, duties, and customs demanded by the Government. The effect of such a course would be to bring the greenback dollar to par value with gold. But it will be said that it will cut off the Treasury from its annual supply of gold from customs. This is true; and, while true, will it be insisted that we shall not supply the Treasury with gold in a different mode? The Government can obtain its annual supply of gold without depreciating legal-tenders and without collecting its customs in coin only. Let the Government apply the annual customs collected in currency to the purchase of their value in gold or foreign exchange. If the acceptance of currency in lieu of gold for customs will have the effect to make their values equal, then there can be no loss. If neither gold or foreign exchange can be had in sufficient quantities, let the Government purchase with currency a sufficient amount of cotton or other articles of export, and thus acquire the necessary gold or exchange. Cotton may no longer be king, but it is gold for all commercial purposes.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, may the volume of our volume be maintained without inflation. Thus may it be appreciated without contraction, and thus may it equal gold in value, without resumption, and the millions now locked up in idleness be forced into active circulation.

By the process of funding our legal-tender issue, or by its redemption in coin, our currency would be reduced four hundred millions less than it now is, and would place the Government and the people at the mercy of two thousand national banks. For be it remembered that after having retired our legal-tender notes we would then have to depend on national banks for a paper currency. We should have then coin and national-bank notes as our only medium of exchange. If the future is to be judged by the past, we would soon be without specie. It would be exhausted in discharging foreign claims, public and private. In that event we would have no other circulation but national-bank notes. We would have to depend exclusively on them for our paper currency. Would these two thousand corporations control their issue for the public good or for their private benefit? The experience of the past and knowledge of the present admonishes us not to confide in them. We have seen the power of money-kings, we have felt the effects of gold-kings, stock-kings, cotton-kings, and black Fridays too severely not to know and to fear the mal-use of their powers. To suit their own interest we would have currency or be without it. At their will their vaults would close or fly open. We might then expect to experience "panics" and "corners" in every department of trade and in every month of the year. This Congress surely will not betray the country into the hands of these two thousand selfish and soulless monsters.

But if it be impossible to resume at once and impracticable to resume in 1879, and Congress will not make legal-tenders receivable for customs dues, then the next best and only thing we can and ought to do is to repeal the resumption act of 1875. The repeal of this act would have the same effect as the resumption of specie payments, or it would destroy the inducement to hoard these notes. It would stop the retirement of national-bank notes and authorize such banks to issue their bills without having any angry cloud hanging over them.

It is impossible to consider these subjects without being impressed with the fact that the Government of the United States is owing a debt of over four hundred millions of legal-tender and fractional-currency notes now in circulation, and that this debt sooner or later must be paid. So far as this debt is concerned there is no danger to be apprehended from any section of the country or from any political party in it at this time. For one, speaking for myself, it has no terrors for me. I have ever appreciated a national debt, and I believe now that the best thing that Congress can do to assure the perpetuity of this Union of States and national Government would be to call in all the bonds held in foreign countries and issue others to be held only by the American people; so that to the extent of this loan, let it be ever so much, each individual citizen would be interested in sustaining the Government. Then taxation to meet the annual interest would be easily borne, as such annual interest, instead of being paid to Europeans, would be returned to the citizen. Such a scheme would do more to bridge over the bloody chasm than all the sentimental orations and hand-shakings of a century.

Mr. Seward uttered a profound truth when he said this Government could not endure half free and half slave. Had there been no slavery, we would have had no secession and consequently no war. Had slavery existed in all the States, instead of being confined to one-half, there would have been no secession and no war. It would have been the interest as well as the duty of each citizen to have sustained the Government. But while the Government stands an acknowledged debtor of the bill-holder, it occupies, with respect to the currency, a different and more important relation to the people of the United States. The Government, having, by an issue of its own notes and by hostile and perhaps unconstitutional legislation, expelled from the country all other paper mediums of exchange, has committed itself to the policy of furnishing such an amount of its own bills as will, without friction or laxity, meet the wants and necessities of our internal commerce.

If the present volume of legal-tender notes is sufficient, it should be continued unchanged. When it becomes too great, either by the increase of coin or national-bank notes or other paper currency, it should be contracted by redemption or by funding in national securities. When it becomes insufficient, either by the exportation of coin or the retirement of national-bank notes or other paper currency, the amount in circulation should be increased until it should meet and supply the necessities of trade; thus providing at all times and under all circumstances a steady and sufficient amount of paper currency for the people and protecting them from sudden expansions and contractions.

This abnormal financial relation of the Government should be abandoned as soon as possible without detriment to the commerce of the country, and to do this a liberal system of banking should be inaugurated, which would enable the people to furnish their own paper currency. While, therefore, it is the duty of the Government to redeem these notes, it is equally its duty, in the process of redemption, to protect our commerce from the effects of sudden contraction.

I confess I have neither stated nor argued my case in a satisfactory manner, but it has been done with the hope, at least, that, while I may not have touched the disease or prescribed a proper remedy, others seeing my errors may correct the one and cure the other.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield thirty minutes of my time to my colleague, [Mr. FELTON.]

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Chairman, there is a bill pending before this House, having been reported back from the Committee on Pensions with a favorable recommendation, granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the Indian wars, known as the Seminole and Black Hawk wars, and also to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war.

I avail myself of this opportunity, during the discussion of the bill making appropriations for the Army, to urge upon the House considerations for the early performance of this long-delayed act of justice and national gratitude.

I am for economy in all public expenditures. The accomplished members of the Committee on Appropriations, who have labored so wisely and indefatigably for a reduction of expenditures, will bear me witness that I have sustained them by my vote in all this laudable work.

When new debts are to be contracted, or when current expenses can be reduced, I will always co-operate with the friends of retrenchment. But when debts have already been contracted, and outstanding obligations are to be discharged, I shall insist that the duty of the nation requires full and prompt cancellation of all such indebtedness. Repudiation can never enter into the calculations of an honorable people.

There are debts and obligations which are not written on parchment, not evidenced by bonds and promissory notes—moral obligations, debts of honor, unwritten promises to pay, which are as binding upon nations as though they were collectable in a "court of claims." Repudiation of the latter is as reprehensible as the former.

A pension law is a recognition of service, a vote of thanks embodied in a tangible, material form. It is not intended as a compensation or as an equivalent, for the service is sometimes far above price. The wealth of a nation would be insufficient as a recompense for some services that may be rendered. For example, the three men—Paulding, Van Wert, and Williams—who arrested Major André, who refused the most tempting bribes, and remembered only their country, thereby saving General Washington, the American army, and the cause of the colonies. These three men received, each, from the Government only $200 per annum as a pension. Who will say that this sum was a compensation or an equivalent for their patriotism and fidelity. It was simply a recognition of valuable service, a testimonial of national gratitude, pleasing to them and encouraging to others.

England understands the value of such recognition. There is an allowance granted to the indigent widows of officers killed or dying in the service, and is considered as a military reward. The fund for these pensions arises from the pay of two fictitious men borne on the muster-roll of every troop or company in the army on the British establishment.

Every officer is assured, if he performs his duty as a soldier, his country will appreciate the service, and will demonstrate that appreciation in some tangible and valuable form. The result is, when on the eve of battle some commander runs up to the mast-head the words "England expects every man to do his duty," victories that live forever in history become the heritage of England's crown.

France understands the value of such recognition by the government of valuable military services. Probably there is no government that rewards her troops so munificently as France. As a result, we see her squadrons mown down by storms of artillery and musketry. If the opposing commander demands their surrender as an act of mercy, the response comes, "The Old Guard can die, but they never surrender."

Our fathers, as I have intimated before, appreciated in an early day of this Government the importance of rewarding distinguished military service. General and special testimonials were voted those soldiers who had contributed to the independence of the American colonies.

The war of the Revolution and the war of 1812 were waged for the purpose of acquiring a de jure title to this country, and it was right and proper that service so successful in wrenching the title to these lands from the British Crown and lodging that title in the American people should have a suitable reward.

But, sir, when that de jure title was acquired by the revolutionary war, and fully confirmed by the war of 1812, by far the largest part of the national domain was in the possession of cruel and warlike savages, disposed to contest every inch of ground with the whites; and I submit that the courage and privation that won for us a possessory title to these lands is also entitled to a suitable recognition by the Government.

There are many rights: Rights of discovery, rights in nature, rights of conquest, and statutory rights, all of which may become practically valueless, because they bring no material benefits, or yield no pecuniary revenues to the man or people holding these vested rights.

Spain had a right by discovery to this continent, yet neither Spain nor any other country enjoyed any material advantage from that right until her citizens and the world came over and "possessed the land."

Florida was ceded to the United States in 1821, and at that time the most desirable portions of that Territory, so rich in interesting historical events and so attractive with its tropical productions, was in the possession of Seminole or "runaway" Creek Indians. These Indians, together with the original tribe of Creeks, who occupied a part of Southwest Georgia and much of Alabama, considered themselves sole owners of the soil.

While I must confess they were frequently maltreated by the white citizens, defrauded and brutalized by designing men, yet after they had made and ratified treaties they would violate these treaties, and under the plea of retaliation they would commit the most cruel and barbarous acts upon the white inhabitants of that country.

War was the result of their perfidy. The Government determined to remove them, and from the assassination of General Thompson and Lieutenant Smith, in 1835, until the final removal of the Indians or their pacification in 1845, the Seminole or Creek war drained the Government of money and the country of valuable citizens and regular soldiers. I find that twelve hundred and fifty-five privates and officers of the regular Army were killed in action or died of disease contracted during the Florida war; also ten surgeons and assistant surgeons; also sixty-three seamen and marines.

I find also that during that war the following number of volunteer troops were furnished to the Government by the States:

States.	Number of officers.	Number of enlisted men.
Florida	727	14,096
South Carolina	140	2,154
District of Columbia	6	120
Alabama	152	2,970
Georgia	280	4,352
Louisiana	64	1,114
Missouri	36	451
New York	6	160
Pennsylvania	18	458
Tennessee	110	1,541

To this number must be added about one thousand friendly Indians, who greatly assisted in the struggle, making a grand total of 29,963 volunteers and militia who risked all that was valuable to meet the demands of their country.

How many of these were killed in action or died of fevers and dysenteries brought on by exposure in the swamps of Florida, I am unable to state. I well remember that the fact of some young man enrolling his name as a volunteer for the Forida war was considered as equivalent to signing his own death-warrant. For many years after the struggle the death of some man in country neighborhoods would provoke the common saying, "He died from disease contracted in the Florida war."

General Scott says:

We found the heat, even before April, so oppressive that the troops could not execute even ordinary marches from this cause alone; the sink-holes and ponds on which both men and horses had to rely for water were many of them dried up, and in others the water was tepid, besides being filled with vegetable matter and animalculæ. Add to these causes of distress and disease the swamps and hammocks which were traversed, the deficiency in bacon, to which the volunteers had been accustomed at home, and the necessity to eat unleavened dough, partially fried with pork or half baked before the camp-fires, and it will astonish no one to learn from the testimony that we had very many individuals, officers and men, that could neither ride nor march. The only resource was to crowd them into wagons.

When we remember the comparative handful of Indians led on by cruel and sagacious chieftains; when we remember the delays and mistakes of public authorities; when we remember the expenditures of the General Government in quelling this border-savage war, it having cost the nation $19,488,000, exclusive of the expenditures pertaining to the regular Army; when we remember the starvation and exposure of the troops and the terrible work of the torch and the scalping-knife, we are convinced there is no page in the history of our Indian wars that surpasses in interest the one which records the Seminole war.

General Scott says, in describing the scarcity of provisions:

That having put Major Cooper's battalion of Georgia foot in march to join General Clinch, he was compelled to recall this battalion, then distant two days' march, over a wretched road, as it was easy to subsist the battalion on the Saint Johns, and infinitely difficult to do so at Fort Drane.

Scott mentions most favorably this fine battalion and its gallant commander. That battalion major lives to-day in my county, an honored ex-member of this House, and as true a patriot as when he faced Indians, fevers, and starvation in Florida.

General Scott, in detailing the difficulties that environed him, also mentions another Georgian from that portion of the State which I have the honor to represent. He says:

The Georgia horse began to arrive about the end of the month, the three companies before mentioned, and another on the 10th of March, under Captain Nelson, who had made an unparalleled march from the northwest corner of Georgia.

And also says:

This fine company, together with Colonel Bankhead's little column, through rain and mud, without tents, and without a murmur, set out with him for Fort Drane.

I wish I had time to allude to all these brave Georgians and all those gallant soldiers from New York to Louisiana. When we remember all their privations, certainly they are entitled to recognition by the General Government.

Sir, it was no holiday pastime for those engaged in the Seminole war. From the massacre of Major Dade and his command of one hundred men; from the sharp, deadly contest of General Clinch and his little army with Osceola and Tusteneggee, on the banks of the Withlacoochee; all the way through skirmish and through ambush, through sortie and through battle, through dense scrub, wading in mud and water, and struggling with embarrassments incident to operations against a foe occupying 47,000 square miles, in a country without roads, bridges, guides, subsistence, or transportation, our soldiers, worn down with constant watchings, disappointments, and tedious marches, yet pressed on in hope of a general engagement with the foe, and always unsuccessful in bringing on this coveted action.

The theater of operations was a wilderness, and every hammock and swamp a citadel for the enemy. In subduing these savages, thus fortified and impelled by a burning thirst for revenge, Scott, Taylor, North, Clinch, Harney, Call, Gaines, and a score of names distinguished in our military history exhausted all their skill and bravery.

Remembering all these obstacles, these embarrassing and exasperating circumstances; the demands made upon men who sacrificed home, business, health, and life; the need for energy, endurance, and unwavering courage, I think the argument is conclusive that the Government which reaped the benefits of this sacrifice, this courage, and endurance should pension the surviving men and widows of those who participated in this terrible border war.

But, sir, there is not an argument in favor of pensioning the soldiers of the Indian wars which does not apply with increased force to the soldiers of our Mexican war. The Indian wars were carried on and successfully terminated chiefly by regular troops. The Mexican war was eminently a war of volunteers. It was the first time in our history when there was such an opportunity of demonstrating the truth that our safety and power are lodged in the intelligence, patriotism, and courage of our citizenship.

Then was established the fact that there is no necessity in this country for standing armies, which consume the products of peaceful industry and sooner or later overturn the liberties of the people; but that it is possible for a nation to surrender itself to the avocations of peace, of productive labor, and at the same time be ready at the first rude alarum of war to carry its flag to victory.

It was during that contest that one State acquired the distinguished sobriquet of the "Volunteer State." Tennessee, with her fifty-eight hundred and sixty-five citizen soldiers, led on by her own chosen officers, never wavering, and sometimes charging over the backs of laggards in the fight that they might reach the enemy, made us understand then and there the honor and military strength of republican governments is deposited in the arms and hearts of its volunteer soldiery.

Never can I forget the military enthusiasm that pervaded this country at that time. Sectionalism and partisanship were dwarfed for the time, and all minor differences faded in the presence of our country's flag. New York and South Carolina at Contreras and Cherubusco forgot all rivalship except the high distinction of being first in the capture of the enemy's stronghold. As they charged shoulder to shoulder, so also the casualties of battle occurred almost equally in that day to these two regiments, New York having seventy-six killed and wounded and South Carolina having one hundred and fifteen killed and wounded. So at Cerro Gordo, the South, the West, and the North mingled their blood in one common assault upon the enemy. At Buena Vista Mississippi, Illinois, Kentucky, Arkansas, Indiana, and Texas, with but little difference in the number of their respective losses, left two hundred and fifty-nine dead upon that field of honor, and about in equal proportion had three hundred and seventy-two wounded.

At Monterey Maryland and the District of Columbia, Ohio, Louisiana, and other States, lost in killed and wounded two hundred and eighty-two; while Missouri, Alabama, Virginia, North Carolina, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Florida all did their duty.

This devotion to country was conspicuous in my own State, and Georgia did her duty in those exciting times. From the section of the State which I represent six companies of true and gallant men were raised, who participated in the glories and sufferings of Mexico. Wofford, Hamilton, C. H. Nelson, Allison Nelson, Fulton, and Jones gathered around them as patriotic and brave companies as ever followed young commanders to a field of strife. Many died, some were killed and wounded, and a great majority of them contracted under the burning sun and in the malarial climate of Mexico diseases which soon carried them to the grave.

These companies, together with others in the regiments of Jackson, Seymour, and Calhoun, also others commanded by Thomas, Doyle, Clark, Ector, and Echols, made up in part the contribution of Georgia to this general assembly of American heroes; in which sectionalism and partisanship were subordinated to the country's interests. Whigs and democrats, free-soilers and pro-slavery men, all hushed their wrangles in the presence of the overtowering claims of a common patriotism.

I repeat, sir, this Government is under obligation to the survivors of this war, and to the widows of those who are deceased, for the immense value of their services to their country. Men should be paid according to the value of the work performed. Where much is given, much is required.

What did we acquire by their sacrifices and devotion? What wealth was added to this country by their labors and sufferings? Not including Texas, though it is properly an acquisition of the war, yet exclusive of this State we obtained by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo territory to the amount of 658,838 square miles, and in 1870 we had in that territory a population of 806,055 inhabitants.

The gold and silver produced by this territory is about as follows:

From—
California	$1,143,620,060
Nevada	289,245,879
Idaho	64,955,525
Utah	38,725,152
Arizona, 1874, 1875	135,159
New Mexico, 1875	500,000
Total	1,537,281,775

It will be seen that the amount set opposite to Arizona is the produce for only two years, while that opposite New Mexico is for one year.

These are all the results we can obtain just now from these Territories. Their produce of the precious metals has never been very large, and would not materially alter the aggregate given.

The total value of agricultural products in the United States in 1870 was $2,447,538,658; the same year the agricultural products of the territory acquired from Mexico was—

Nevada	1,659,713
Utah	1,973,142
Arizona	277,998
Total	47,309,734

Now, add all the prospective population and wealth of this territory, its growing commerce with the East, its undeveloped resources, mineral, agricultural, and commercial, its rapidly increasing population, with its capacity to sustain millions of enterprising and industrious people—add to this the mastership which its possession secures to us over Mexico. Mexico is the American "sick man." The Pacific States can maintain a "masterly inactivity" and patiently await the result.

Now add to this the influence which it gives us over the trade with China, Japan, and the islands of the Pacific.

What a future! The center of our population west of the Mississippi! The dream of ambition in olden times never realized such a magnificent empire.

Whence did it come? To whom are we indebted for its possession? Remember, sir, all this is but the blood, the suffering, and heroism of our soldiers crystallized into material wealth and national power.

I have read of a great king, who on a certain night could not sleep, and he commanded to bring the book of records, and they were read before the king. It was found that Mordecai had done the king a great service, and the king said, "What honor and dignity hath been done to Mordecai for this?" Then said the king's servants that ministered unto him, "There is nothing done for him." This king in his wakefulness at night seems to have been apprehensive that some faithful friend and subject should fail to get the rewards he merited, that he might be omitting a grateful recognition of valuable service. He was determined that whatsoever might be alleged against Ahasuerus, the charge of ingratitude should not be preferred. He commanded that he be clothed in royal apparel and a crown be placed upon his head, and as he passed through the streets proclamation should be made, "Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighted to honor."

To-day as we read from the book of records and ask the question, What rewards and honors hath been given to these heroes of the Mexican war, the answer is "There is nothing done for them."

The question of loyalty is frequently raised upon subjects of this character—upon all claims against the Government originating previous to the late civil war. If I contract a debt or incur an obligation of any description, it seems to me that no subsequent change in the relations of the parties can abrogate or annul that obligation.

It is true that change may be made an excuse for an evasion of a just debt or obligation; but nations, having due regard to their honor, will never resort to so cheap a subterfuge, alike discreditable to honesty and magnanimity.

Sir, is not this Union restored? Are not the citizens of the Southern States, here and everywhere, the constitutional peers of the citizens of other States? Have they not contributed as liberally of their blood and treasure in the acquisition of all the territory that makes up the territorial wealth of the United States as has been contributed by other sections? Have not the creators of this wealth, the men "who commanded and it stood forth," some right to a recognition of their patriotism and their courage?

In discussing this question of obligation to the heroes of the Mexican war, let no political or sectional Pharisee say to any southern man, "Stand back; I am holier than thou;" for the truth will not sustain him in the selfish and arrogant assertion.

Let us put aside all sectional and unauthorized phraseology; let us remember that this measure will tend to restore kind and fraternal relations between the two sections, more than all the resolutions and declarations that can pass this Congress or be uttered by any number of political conventions.

This measure is one of conciliation. It reunites; it fills up the "bloody chasm." It runs the plowshare over the battle-fields of sections. It brings the brave and patriotic men of the past and the brave men of the present into the brotherhood of a common citizenship. It heals wounded and estranged hearts. It convinces all men that for the future we are a united people, because our interests and hopes are centered in a common government.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PARSONS.]

Mr. PARSONS. I avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Georgia to make application for consent to print in the RECORD some remarks which I have prepared upon House bill No. 472, bearing on the question of the Texas and Pacific Railroad.

No objection was made, and the leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.]

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I propose to submit some remarks upon the hackneyed theme of the currency. It is almost impossible, sir, to exaggerate the importance of this question. It is the war power of the Government; without money armies in the field cannot be supported. It is the civil power of the Government; without money the machinery of our Government cannot be operated. It is the commercial power of the nation; without money our commerce cannot be floated, and it is the most important power of all the interests of the country; the grand lubricator of all its industries.

This being so, I wish to beg the indulgence of the House while I shall endeavor candidly to review something of the relations of this subject toward the country, and particularly its relations to the democratic party.

Mr. Chairman, in 1789 the Government of the United States had a foreign debt of $53,000,000; it had a home debt of $22,000,000; making in the aggregate $75,000,000. At the same time the country had $12,000,000 of specie and seven millions of currency, making an aggregate of $19,000,000. It became apparent to the financial statesmen of the day that it was impossible with $19,000,000 of currency to pay off a foreign debt of $75,000,000, to furnish money to the national and State governments for their administration, and at the same time to float the rising commerce of the new-born country. Hence it became necessary to resort to certain expedients to supply the deficiency of the currency.

Mr. Hamilton, who was at that time financial minister, proposed the plan of a United States bank, so that the United States might furnish the requisite quantity of currency. His plan, from necessity, was approved by the Cabinet of the time, Mr. Jefferson assenting as one of the Cabinet; and the Congress of the United States passed the bill by a vote of 39 to 20; so that fixed the question of currency for twenty years in the United States, the basis being that of a mixed currency.

Upon the expiration of the charter, after a short interval it was renewed in 1816, which fixed it for another period of twenty years, terminating in 1836. The war of 1812–1814 ran up the national debt from $75,000,000 to $127,000,000. All the Presidents of the United States—Mr. Monroe, Mr. Madison, Mr. Adams, and General Jackson—held the view, in which the Congress of the United States concurred, that the national debt was a national curse, and the whole bent of the administration of the country was to relieve it from the incubus of the national debt. Hence we find that in 1836, for the first time since the Government was established, we reached what was called a normal financial base in the extinguishment of the national debt; and just here let me erect a monument; the nation was out of debt, and, as Mr. Benton said, we had been traveling forty years in the wilderness to reach that point.

And it became necessary then, in the estimation of some of the existing statesmen, to change the course of the financial policy. It was followed by what was called the specie circular, which proposed to receive all the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in specie. Upon the issuance of this circular, taking the country by surprise as it did, the people, having purchased nearly twenty-five million dollars' worth of the public lands and being in debt for the payment thereof, petitioned the Government for the revocation of the circular, but without effect; they petitioned Congress for relief, but without relief being granted. They were forced to the alternative of complying with the demands of the Government, and the result was that, upon calling upon the State banks for the redemption of their notes and drawing from their vaults the specie to meet their obligation to the Government, every State bank from Massachusetts to Louisiana sunk as though it had been upon a running quicksand.

There were financial calamity and distress. Bankruptcy stared the nation in the face. The New York merchants presented a petition to the Congress of the United States, depicting in glowing colors the condition of that great metropolis, to which I invite the attention of this body at this time. The attention of Representatives is respectively requested to this petition. The New York merchants affirmed that the value of their real estate had within the last six months depreciated more than $40,000,000; that within the preceding two months there had been more than two hundred and fifty failures of houses engaged in extensive business; that within the same period a decline of twenty millions had occurred in their local stocks, including those railroad and canal incorporations which, though chartered in other States, depended chiefly upon New York for their sale; that the immense amount of merchandise in their warehouses had within the same period fallen in value at least 30 per cent.; that within a few weeks not less than 20,000 individuals, depending upon their daily labor for their daily bread, had been discharged by their employers because the means of retaining them were exhausted; and that a complete blight had fallen upon a community heretofore so active, enterprising, and prosperous; the errors of our rulers they declared "had produced a wider desolation than the pestilence which depopulated our streets or the conflagration which laid them in ashes."

With calamity staring the country in the face, and in order that it might be met, the democratic party insisted at the time that this calamity was partly the result of overbanking, overtrading, overdashing, overdriving, overeating, overdrinking, and overeverything except overworking. But they went into the issue with the specie circular and the bankruptcy upon the nation at the time, and in 1840 they were perfectly overwhelmed and routed in every particular.

They rallied, however, in 1844 upon the same issue, and upon the admission of Texas into the Union. While they did that, I beg leave to call the attention of this honorable body, and particularly the democrats of this House, to the platform which was adopted by that party in 1840, 1844, 1848, 1852, and 1856, five consecutive national platforms adhering to the same declaration of principles. Here it is. Your attention, if you please, to the seventh and eighth articles of the democratic national platform:

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1840 AND 1856.

7. That Congress has no power to charter a national bank; that we believe such an institution one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power, and above the laws and the will of the people; [and that the results of democratic legislation in this and all other financial measures upon which issues have been made between the two political parties of the country have demonstrated to candid and practical men of all parties their soundness, safety, and utility in all business pursuits.*]

8. That the separation of the moneys of the Government from banking institutions is indispensable for the safety of the funds of the Government and the rights of the people.

That was the declaration of the democratic national platform upon finance. You see there was nothing said in that platform upon the subject of even the national finances or the currency in which the revenues of the Government were to be collected. But under the authority of the President of the United States the revenues were collected in gold and silver, except as afterward modified by the laws of Congress, to which I shall allude.

There was another feature connected with this, that so far as the financial affairs of the State governments were concerned the democratic party were composed of too good States-rights men to invade the rights of the States in relation to their currency. They did not quarrel with any State that saw proper to adopt an exclusively metallic currency, nor did they quarrel with one that saw proper to adopt State banks and State financial agencies to aid them in the administration of their State governments and to furnish the people with the currency. We find that General Jackson favored that, and used in his sixth annual message the following language:

If the several States shall be induced generally to reform their banking systems and prohibit the issue of small notes, we shall in a few years have a currency as sound and as little liable to fluctuations as any other commercial country.

Mr. Benton used the following language in his Thirty-Years View:

He deprecated the spirit which seemed to have broken out against State banks; it was a spirit which argued badly for the rights of the States. Those banks were created by the States, and the works of the States ought to be respected. (Page 456.)

Again he says:

The spirit of hostility to the State banks was of recent origin, and seemed to keep pace with the spirit of attack on the political rights of the States. When the first Federal bank was created in the year 1791, it was not even made by its charter a place of deposit for the public moneys. Mr. Jefferson preferred the State banks at that time, and so declared himself in his cabinet opinion to President Washington. (Page 456.)

We find that up to that time the democratic party, adopting as its policy opposition to national banks, being either passive or in favor of State banks, urged the retirement of small State bank-notes by refusing them for Federal revenues, by advocating the introduction of coin in the place of small notes, and the payment of Federal revenues in gold, silver, and Treasury notes.

Now, when we enter upon the ground after that time there may be some confusion in relation to the democratic policy, but still the road can be traced, and I propose to follow it up and show from the record the policy adopted by the democratic party.

In 1863, when it was proposed to charter the national banks, when the vote was taken in the Senate upon the proposition, there were but two democrats for to twelve against it. In the House there were two democrats for and forty-two against it. When the supplemental bank bill of 1864 was on its passage there was in the Senate no democratic vote for and seven against; in the House not one democratic vote for and sixty-five against it. Among the democrats who voted against it were Messrs. EDEN, HOLMAN, MORRISON, RANDALL, and FERNANDO WOOD.

Again, upon the subject of taxing the Government bonds and securities held by the banks in the different States of the United States, when that proposition was submitted upon Mr. Fenton's amendment, the democrats stood fifty-three for it and none against it. We find that while the Government had about $2,500,000,000 funded in bonds, constituting a bank capital in part and retired for the purpose of sanctuary and shelter from taxation, the democratic party as a party were opposed to such legislation as being in the interest of the money power and against the interests of the many.

But that is not all. On Mr. SHERMAN'S Senate bill of July 7, 1870, being a proposition to increase the amount of national-bank-note circulation the democratic vote in the House was 4 for and 44 against it, showing that they were opposed to the increase of the circulation of these incorporated institutions. So far as the previous legislation was concerned upon the subject, Mr. RANDALL in the House June 14, 1870, offered a substitute for the Senate bill, which substitute proposed to issue $300,000,000 of legal-tender notes to redeem the outstanding national-bank notes and put them out of circulation. Upon that proposition the democratic vote of the House stood 42 ayes and 5 noes. Mr. Morgan, of Ohio, on the same day offered a substitute to repeal the national-bank act and proposing to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to have executed gold Treasury notes to the amount of $400,000,000 to redeem the national-bank notes and for other purposes, and that all taxes, duties, and imposts of every kind payable to the Government of the United States should be receivable in gold, silver, or Treasury notes at the option of the person making the payment; and upon the redemption of the public debt all outstanding Treasury notes shall be redeemed at par in gold or silver in a manner to be provided for by law. The democratic vote was 34 for to 9 against it. Again, in 1870, January 17, Mr. McNeeley moved to suspend the rules and put the following resolution on its passage:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and they are hereby, instructed to report at an early day a bill providing for withdrawing from circulation the national-bank currency, and for issuing instead of such currency Treasury notes, usually known as "greenbacks."

* Words in brackets added in 1848.

The democratic vote was 53 for and 2 against it. For it, Beck, COX, HOLMAN, KERR, KNOTT, Morgan, Niblack, RANDALL, Voorhees, and FERNANDO WOOD among others. The two against it were Messrs. POTTER and BARNUM. Again, in regard to the act to strengthen the public credit, of March 18, 1869, which proposed to pay gold instead of greenbacks in the redemption or payment of bonds of the United States, occasioning a loss by changing the contract as understood to the extent of $500,000,000. On that proposition the democratic vote stood 1 for and 34 against it. Again, in regard to the resumption act of January 14, 1875, which proposed to retire the legal-tender notes and abandon the field of currency to the national banks, not one democrat voted for it, but every one voted against the proposition.

The demonstration is complete that opposition to national banks for forty-four years has been a vital and cardinal principle of the democratic party. It is proved by the veto of the United States Bank act by Jackson in 1832; by the indorsement of his veto on his re-election by the people; by five democratic national conventions; by the democratic vote against the national-bank bills in 1863 and 1864; by the democratic vote to authorize States to tax Government securities and obligations held by the national banks; by the democratic vote on the McNeeley resolution of January 17, 1870, to wind up the national banks; by their vote against the Sherman bill of July 7, 1870, to increase the national-bank issues; by their vote on the Randall resolution proposing to substitute legal-tender notes for national-bank notes; by their vote on the Morgan substitute on the same day to wind up the national banks and to make legal-tenders receivable for all taxes, customs, and other debts due to the United States, and by their unanimous vote against the resumption act of January 14, 1875, which proposed to supersede the legal-tender notes of the United States.

You find that there is not one broken link in the democratic policy, and if we are asked where we stand at the present time we must place the democratic party on this old cardinal doctrine and principle, or it must prepare for a new departure, and into an unknown sea. For my part, I propose to adhere to the old principle, to stand by the old policy, and to demonstrate that the democratic party has been consistent in its maintenance of this old principle.

Now, it is just as well established that the democratic party as a party has been the advocate of Treasury notes as that they have been opposed to the national-bank system.

And if I can have the attention of this House, Mr. Chairman, I propose to demonstrate it as plainly as if written by a sunbeam on the face of the heavens.

Who was the author of the Treasury-note system? Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to Mr. Epps, stated it was practiced by Virginia in its colonial state; that Virginia had issued notes bearing interest bottomed upon a tax. They were soon sequestered, disappeared from circulation, went into the hands of guardians, executors, and others, occupying a fiduciary relation. Others were issued bearing no interest, and they circulated freely at par as long as they remained. I have an extract from his letter which I propose to read to this House, and to which I call attention as he proposed to apply the doctrine to the national Government. Here it is.

In volume 6, pages 139 and 140 of his Correspondence, letter to John W. Epps, June 24, 1813, he says:

And so the nation may continue to issue its bills as far as its wants require and the limits of the circulation will admit. Those limits are understood to extend with us at present to $200,000,000, a greater sum than would be necessary for any war. But this, the only resource which the Government could command with certainty, the States have unfortunately fooled away, nay, corruptly alienated to swindlers and shavers under the color of private banks. Say, too, as an additional evil, that the disposal funds of individuals, to this great amount, have thus been drawn from improvement and useful enterprise, and employed in the useless, usurious, and demoralizing practices of bank directors and their accomplices.

In the war of 1755 our State availed itself of this fund by issuing a paper money bottomed on a specific tax for its redemption, and, to insure its credit, bearing an interest of 5 per cent. Within a very short time not a bill of this emission was to be found in circulation. It was locked up in the chests of executors, guardians, widows, farmers, &c. We then issued bills bottomed on a redeeming tax, but bearing no interest. These were readily received, and never depreciated a single farthing. * * * If Treasury bills are emitted on a tax appropriated for their redemption in fifteen years, and (to insure preference in the first moments of competition) bearing an interest of 6 per cent., there is no one who would not take them in preference to bank paper now afloat, on a principle of patriotism as well as interest; and they would be withdrawn from circulation into private hoards to a considerable amount. Their credit once established, others might be emitted, bottomed also on a tax, but not bearing interest; and if ever this credit faltered, open public loans, on which alone these bills should be received as specie. These, operating as a sinking fund, would reduce the quantity in circulation so as to maintain that in an equilibrium with specie. It is not easy to estimate the obstacles which, in the beginning, we should encounter in ousting the banks from their possession of the circulation; but a steady and judicious alternation of emissions and loans would reduce them in time. * * * But, it will be asked, are we to have no banks? Are merchants and others to be deprived of the resource of short accommodations, found so convenient? I answer, let us have banks. * * * There is not a bank of discount on the continent of Europe (or at least there was not one while I was there) which offers anything but cash in exchange for discounted bills. No one has a natural right to the trade of a money-lender but he who has money to lend. Let those, then, among us who have a moneyed capital, and who prefer employing it in loans rather than otherwise, set up bank, and give cash or national bills for the notes they discount.

There is the tap-root of the Treasury-note system, advocated first by the great apostle of democratic teachings, the forerunner, the head-light which has thrown its beams along down the path of posterity and which may illumine the nation now and carry it out of the wilderness in safety. This was afterward recommended by Van Buren, advocated by Calhoun, voted for by Benton, Buchanan, and other exponents of the democratic party. Calhoun stated in his great speech in 1837 upon the subject of these Treasury notes:

> But whatever may be the amount that can be circulated, I hold it clear that, to that amount, it would be as stable in value as gold and silver itself, provided the Government be bound to receive it exclusively with those metals in all its dues, and that it be left perfectly optional with those who have claims on the Government to receive it or not.—Appendix to Congressional Globe, first session Twenty-fifth Congress, page 36, 1837.

But these notes were not only voted for and advocated by those great exponents of the democratic party, but the legislation of the country put its seal on the great question and put it beyond any dispute as to what was our true policy. But in 1837, so soon after specie circulation, why was it that bankruptcy spread broadcast all over the country? Simply because the Government was without revenue and the people without money. The Government attempted to supply it by pledging its credit, putting out Treasury notes to circulate as money, which, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1819, were held to be legal tenders to the Government of the United States. From that time down to the present, both in democratic and republican administrations, the Government has constantly adhered to the policy of Treasury notes.

Now, to the record, to see whether I am right or wrong. The act of Congress of 1814 authorized their issue and it was approved by Madison. The act of October 12, 1837, authorized the issue of ten millions, making them receivable in payment of all duties, taxes, debts due to the United States. The act of May 21, 1838, made them re-issuable. The act of March 12, 1839, authorized the issue of the remainder of the notes which had not been issued. The act of March 31, 1840, extended the time of issue twelve months and made them re-issuable. The act of February 15, 1841, authorized the issue of five millions additional. The act of January 31, 1842, authorized five millions to be issued in place of others redeemed. The act of April 15, 1842, authorized the re-issue of any that had been taken up. The act of July 22, 1846, authorized the issue of ten millions additional. That was during the Mexican war. The act of August 6, 1846, provides, (and now the attention of every Representative in this House if I can get it,) provides—

> That on the 1st day of January, 1847, and thereafter, all duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money accruing or becoming due to the United States, and also all sums due for postages, or otherwise, to the general Post-Office Department, shall be paid in gold and silver coin only, or in Treasury notes, issued under the authority of the United States. (9 United States Statutes at Large, page 64.)

So you find the democratic party so far as that was concerned put the Treasury notes upon a par with gold and silver, and gave the great legislative equation to gold and silver and Treasury notes, and there it permitted it to remain until disturbed by other legislation.

The act of January 28, 1847, authorized the issue of twenty-three millions additional, receivable in like manner for all taxes.

The act of December 23, 1857, authorized the issue of $20,000,000 additional, receivable in like manner. The act of March 3, 1859, authorized the issue and re-issue of notes, extended to July 1, 1860.

So we find that Treasury notes were issued by every democratic administration; and after the inauguration of the civil war they were issued by both parties as indispensable to move the armies and float the navies. And, as the language was used by the Supreme Court of the United States, there was not gold enough to have answered the purposes of the Government for three months, and the nation from necessity had to coin its credit. So we find that they were not only used in time of war, but they were used in time of peace; twenty-three years of peace during these five successive democratic administrations with the broad seal of the legislation of the country stamped upon them. And now let me make the inquiry here: When, since the foundation of the Government, was there a more safe, uniform currency than from the time of the issuing of these Treasury notes during those democratic administrations?

Mr. Chairman, what is the conclusion of this matter? In the language of the act of August 6, 1846, the democratic party have been for Federal currency, for gold and silver, or Treasury notes issued under the authority of the United States. And here it stands to-day, as I have shown, by every vote they have given. If we wish to find the landmarks of the democratic party, if the House will excuse the sophomoric language of the school-boy, when we look out for it we will see it looming up

> As some tall cliff, that lifts its awful form,
> Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
> Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
> Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

There it stands to-day, the uncrumbling, imperishable monument, fixing the wisdom of the legislation of the country. Not even the rough blows and tornadoes of war and civil convulsion could disturb or unsettle the great democratic doctrine and teaching of the country. Even while the waves rolled high in our civil commotion, that same old doctrine was thrown out like the sheet-anchor of a man-of-war, and still it will hold this nation in safety if it will only abide by it and if the Saint Louis convention will be true to its teachings.

So we find the democratic party is not a rag-money party. It never has lifted its voice or voted against gold and silver. We can appeal to the record. It never has proposed to demonetize silver, one of the old coins of the country, but one that has received the approbation and, if you please, the love of our fathers when it used to cliuk music to their ears. They were in favor of gold and silver and against demonetizing silver, as they had traveled together from the days of Abraham down to the present time; but while they were in favor of them they were not exclusively in favor of them. This Government never could have been administered solely upon gold and silver. It has always resorted to the issue of notes. The old continental money—the two hundred millions of it at the end of the revolutionary war—was only as the shell left in the nest after the eagle was hatched and had flown, and the emblem bird continued its flight until it beat its wings against the gates of the setting sun. And those old warriors were well paid in an unbounded domain, and with that liberty the heritage which their children enjoy to-day. And if the democratic party in the Saint Louis convention will unbare its arm and advocate that doctrine, it will rescue the fortunes of the sinking nation. Let it unbare its arm and display the action of its larger muscle in spreading a shield over the head of the millions, in the interest of labor, instead of getting upon its knees and crawling recreant before the golden gods set up to be worshiped in this country.

Well, now we stand and look out upon the future, and there are three measures of financial policy which we may adopt. Shall we adopt the State-banking system? Shall we adopt the national-banking system? Or shall we adopt the Treasury-note system of furnishing a paper currency to the United States? Some have advocated a State-bank system. According to Madison and Jefferson and others, as they have generally been established in the United States, they were placed upon an immoral basis, and no financial system could ever rest securely upon it; because we are told by Amasa Walker, who investigated this matter, that the average issue of these State banks has been about 4½ to 1, say 4 to 1 in coin. The State bank-notes are neither the representatives of gold in the vaults nor are they substitutes for gold in the vaults; because if there be only one gold dollar for four of issue when you have redeemed the one dollar, three remain without representation or substitution. As a matter of course that system founded upon a theory of that description would be delusive in the end to the people; for when the financial gale begins, when there is the least disturbance abroad, the foundation of the system is shown to be upon sand, instead of the solid granite which should underlie it. It is not based upon national credit, but upon the credit of a corporation. Hence, while no member of the democratic party will quarrel with any State that sees proper to adopt it as a system of its own, we would say that the theory as practiced heretofore is, according to the views of the old statesmen and according to the test we have developed, an experiment which has proved a failure, and we cannot recommend it.

Then will you adopt the national-bank system? It has been a doctrine of the old democratic party to oppose all monopolies and all financial connections between the Government and banking corporations. At the very threshold you find that these national banks are the monopolists of all the currency of the country. In respect to these banks, the State governments crawl like Lazarus at the gate of the rich man, waiting for the crumbs to fall from their tables. These corporations are nothing but sheer, unmitigated monopolies, which have met the reprehension of the democracy in all times.

Not only so, but we find that they have certain privileges extended to them in the exemption from taxation of all stocks, bonds, and other securities of the United States held by national banks in the States. These are exempted from taxation according to the act of June 30, 1864, chapter 172, section 1.

But, in addition to that, they are founded upon a merely delusive and dangerous basis so far as their deposits are concerned. They are required to keep only 25 per cent. reserve, lawful money, in redemption cities, 15 per cent. in other places, making an average of about 20 per cent. According to the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency the deposits of these banks amounted to $675,358,346. Only one-fifth of this amount is secured by the charters, which would be $135,071,669. Four-fifths are not secured, amounting to $540,286,677. Thus we find that, though the circulation may be secured by the deposits of bonds, the actual deposits of the banks have no security except about 20 per cent. of reserves which are held for that purpose. The remainder is based upon the credit of the national banks or their stockholders; and the individual stockholders are bound only to the extent of their stock; there is no individual liability beyond this. A Vanderbilt may hold one thousand dollars' worth of stock in a national bank, and if it fails he escapes with the payment of his thousand dollars. In addition to that, the 10 per cent. tax excludes all competition in relation to this matter.

Let us test this matter further. There have been forty national-bank failures in the United States. Let the Comptroller of the Treasury, who sits as a financial Neptune swaying the trident over the financial sea, point to a single broken national bank that has ever paid its depcsits. There is no such case; and generally the depositors have found poor comfort in raking among the detritus of a bankrupt court to get some partial satisfaction.

But that is not all. With all the frailties and imperfections of these banks, let us look into some of their other constituents. Mr. Amasa Walker, in giving the sources of their interest, makes the following summary, which I apply to the figures as they exist at the present time, as appears from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for December, 1875:

The loans and discounts of the national banks were	$980, 222, 951
Overdrafts	4, 468, 484
United States bonds to secure circulation	370, 321, 700
United States bonds to secure deposits	14, 097, 200
United States bonds on hand	13, 989, 950
Other stocks, mortgages, &c	33, 505, 045
Total drawing interest	1, 416, 605, 330

Upon the other hand the actual capital of these banks at the same time was—

Capital stock paid in	$504, 929, 769
Surplus fund	134, 356, 076
Profits on hand	52, 964, 954
Total capital	692, 150, 799

Deducting the latter amount from the former, we have $724,554,531 as the pure credit element of the currency; that is mere indebtedness of the banks but for which, although it was neither money nor capital, they were receiving interest over and above all their actual capital.

Let me call attention to a very simple illustration of the operation of these national banks. They are drawing 6 per cent. interest semi-annually in gold upon their bonds. Converting this semi-annual gold interest into legal-tenders makes an actual interest of about 7½ per cent. The Comptroller of the Currency states that, after the payment of all expenses, taxes and otherwise, the dividends of these institutions are 10½ per cent. Add to this 7½ per cent., and it makes 18 per cent. interest which the stockholders of these banks are drawing upon credit and upon capital.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The dividends include the interest received on Government bonds.

Mr. BRIGHT. Assuming, then, that I am mistaken and that the interest of the bonds is included in the 10½ per cent. dividend as reported by the Comptroller of the Currency, excluding the surplus fund on which no dividend is declared, such a statement will still illustrate the point which I have in view.

But to the illustration. The national banks declare a dividend of 10½ per cent., and from a computation in regard to all the other industries in the country it appears that they produce—and I wish this important fact to be understood and to go to the country—that all other industries of the country produce only about 4 per cent. interest or less on the amount of capital invested, leaving 6½ per cent. advantage so far as the national banks are concerned, and it is only a question of time when the banks shall eat up the other industries of the country.

And not only that. I am not done with them yet. The danger of these institutions, with the rapidity and concert of their action, is that they are in a situation to enter into commercial conspiracies by the contraction and expansion of their currency and the manipulation, if you choose, of your Agricultural Department statistics so that they can absolutely control the price of productions in this country. Yes, sir, and they will do it if they are left free and unrebuked in this country.

When your crops are ready for the market, when the hard-handed agriculturist, who has borne the brunt and the heat of the day, who has sweltered beneath the sun to produce his crops, has wrung them from the earth by his rugged toil, why, sir, you find a set of manipulators ready who can contract the currency and thereby keep out the produce from market and purchase at their own terms. And when once they have secured this, then they can expand again and they can throw it into the power of any pets or favorites to reap a large profit out of the labor of the man who has furnished the capitalist with the subject of his speculation.

And that is not all. They cannot only perpetrate commercial conspiracies, but they can embark in political conspiracies; and there is the dangerous element to the liberties of this country. Whenever this Government denudes itself of its power, abandons the control of its money, which is the highest act of sovereignty, to these corporations, it has put itself and all the people in the hands and in the power of these corporations. I am not speaking without warrant. I do not propose to guess and blunder along through these statistical facts to do these corporations an injury. Not at all. I propose to speak within the record; to have at my back the verification of facts to support the assertions I make.

First, as far as the question of inclination is concerned and the interference of these institutions with the legislation of the country.

Speaking of the political influence of banks, Mr. Madison, in a letter to Thomas Jefferson, April 23, 1796, wrote as follows, in relation to the ratification of a treaty:

> The banks have been powerfully felt in the progress of the petitions in the cities for the treaty. Scarce a merchant or a trader but what depends on discounts, and at this moment there is a general pinch for money. Under such circumstances a bank director soliciting subscriptions is like a highwayman with a pistol demanding the purse.

Not only so, but I might refer to the action as charged upon the bank power by General Jackson, Mr. Benton, and others; what it did in olden time; how it was charged that it subsidized the press, corrupted the ballot-box, throttled the State banks, fought its way through both Houses of Congress, and thundered at the doors of the Capitol; when the old hero Andrew Jackson stood up in his might, seized the veto power and wielded it as the warrior wields his battle-ax, and it descended crushing through bone and brain, and the antagonist sunk prostrate at his feet.

Such were the allegations that were made against it then. But I do not intend to let it rest even at that. Andrew Jackson demonstrated a power and a determination in relation to one United States bank. What do you suppose the old hero would do now if turned loose among twenty-three hundred of those that have sprung up like dragon's teeth apparently from the old root? Would he not go out to battle like Samson with the jawbone of an ass among the Philistines?

But there are not only illustrations from the past; but to bring it nearer home, and to make it more applicable to these banks themselves, let me say that I have reliable information that in consideration of Mr. Chase having been the author of the national-bank system, they proposed to form a bank combination to run him for the Presidency, or to secure his nomination. All the presidents, all the directors, all the clerks were to combine to manipulate the primary conventions for the purpose of securing his nomination.

Mr. LAWRENCE. They did not succeed very well.

Mr. BRIGHT. They did not succeed, but the will was there; the animus was there.

Mr. LAWRENCE. How many delegates did they get?

Mr. BRIGHT. No matter for that. I will give you something else in relation to it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Very well.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have it from reliable information that there was a bank agreement or conspiracy that each one of the banks should be put under contribution to furnish one dollar out of every thousand dollars of their circulation for the purpose of influencing legislation in their behalf. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would like the gentleman to furnish the proof.

Mr. BRIGHT. If you call for the proof it can be had.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would like to see it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not care to give the names unless it becomes necessary. But I have it here indorsed with the authority of a respectable gentleman from New York, and indorsed by a member of Congress in this House who was a bank officer, a bank president, and knows the facts. And if it is necessary his letter shall be published, and made evidence of the fact which I stated. And if you wish, other evidence shall be produced.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, (in his seat.) Is that a subject for another investigation?

Mr. BRIGHT. The letter is called for; here is the letter:

> 214 D STREET N. W., WASHINGTON, D. C., June 1, 1876.
> DEAR SIR: I was told some months since by Dr. EGBERT, member of Congress from the twenty-seventh district, Pennsylvania, that when he was president of a national bank, I think in Mercer, Pennsylvania, that they were assessed $1 upon each thousand dollars of their circulation as a fund to secure legislation in their interests; and he said he supposed this was general throughout the country. This would give an annual fund of about $350,000, and yourself can compute its corrupting influence as well as any one. Dr. EGBERT was six years at the head of a national bank.
> Yours, very truly,
> EGBERT HASARD.
> HON. J. M. BRIGHT, M. C., Washington, D. C.
> When Dr. E. returns I will introduce him to you, and he will repeat it.

That letter was submitted to Mr. EGBERT, who sits near me here, and was approved by him, and he is ready to-day, so far as he is concerned, to testify, and there is other testimony on the subject.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. The gentleman will allow me to say that I have been cashier of a national bank for twenty years and the subject of politics has never been mentioned in it, and not only that, but let me say that there are thirteen directors, twelve of whom are republicans and one a democrat, and no man has ever mentioned a word of politics in connection with that bank.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will ask if the gentleman has ever been called upon to make any contribution for political purposes?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Never, sir.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If any member of this House has been giving money to influence legislation here he ought to be investigated. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no objection to such an investigation and to my friend from New York being appointed chairman of the committee to investigate.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Ah, they do not appoint chairmen from this side of the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. I tell you, furthermore, that I think a highly penal act ought to be passed imposing a penalty for any bank director or officer implicated in charges of this sort. I make no imputation upon my friend from New Jersey [Mr. HARDENBERGH] or upon any bank officer here; but the facts I have stated are verified by authority, and I therefore make the statement, and it is credible. If these corporations are permitted to come here to influence the legislation of the country, I think it is time that a check and rebuke should be given to them. I proclaim here that they are the enemies of human liberty and the constitutional rights of the people, the invaders of the legislation of the country. Their relation to the people is a financial one. That relation is a pecuniary one; it is one for the purpose of traffic; it is one for the purpose of making the people bleed money. There is nothing in harmony between them and the industries of the country, except as they can make profit out of them.

But at the same time, while I make these remarks in relation to these corporations, it is in no unfriendly spirit toward any member or any corporator that may have interest in them. They are lawful institutions. Every citizen of the United States has a right to embark in them if he sees proper to do so. I would not have these banks wound up summarily, but let them go into liquidation gradually, for the safety of the people and the prosperity of the industrial interests of the country. The people are owing them $1,000,000,000, and if you were to force them into settlement immediately it would bankrupt the whole country, and for that reason, although the evil is there, I would let it grow like tares among the wheat until the time to put in the sickle for the harvest, without doing injury to any one.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I conceive that these national banks are part of a system which ought not to be tolerated at all; and I come to another proposition, and that is to the consideration of the Treasury note. I maintain, sir, first, that it is the cheapest, that it is the safest, that it is the more democratic currency. These legal-tender notes cost one-fourth of 1 per cent. in their manufacture; they bear no interest. I have told you what the interest is on the national-bank notes. This Treasury note is safe as the Government itself. All the taxing powers of the Government are pledged for its payment; all the mountains of gold and silver, all the cattle on a thousand hills, all the national funds are pledged for the security of this note. Now there is no better security. The security of the national banks is not to be brought into competition for one moment with it. It has been indorsed by the Government, indorsed by the democratic party, indorsed by the people. The people are satisfied with it, and no petitions come from the masses asking you to supersede it. Have any such petitions come? Never! never! never!

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are some remarkable facts connected with the Treasury-note system of the United States. It can be well verified that during the Mexican war, when gold and silver were taken out into the heart of Mexico for the purpose of paying our soldiers, we had $10,000,000 of Treasury notes, which were sent along with the gold and silver; and how did the matter stand between the Treasury notes and gold? Would you believe it? The Treasury note was worth 6 per cent. more than American gold in the heart of that country, because they did not wish to be encumbered with the gold. The faith of the Government was sufficient. Even British merchants would sell gold to purchase United States notes; would take these notes to Liverpool or London and there pay debts to the United States or its citizens for productions of this country, and were well satisfied with their bargain.

From 1837 to 1861 Treasury notes were at a par with gold. There was no depreciation of them at all, and they remained without depreciation until the Government itself saw proper to set its seal of condemnation upon them, to shake its head and tell the holders of these notes that it would not receive them in payment of interest upon public bonds or in payment of customs duties. This was the time when your Treasury notes first received their depreciating influence, which has continued to this day.

At the time the Government was fixing this depreciation upon its notes Thaddeus Stevens declared in this Hall that the Government was depreciating its own currency, turning its back upon its own credit; and he condemned the measure with reprehension such as perhaps the Government deserved at that time. It surely does not lie in the mouth of the Government, it certainly does not lie in the mouth of any advocate of the Treasury note issued during the recent war, to say that there is a discount upon this note as compared with gold. The fault lies at the door of the Government itself; it is not the fault of the currency.

What did General Grant say upon this subject? and I suppose he is good authority with our republican friends. In 1873 he said: "It is the best ever devised." It is based on the nation's faith and the nation's wealth. When I have a legal tender in my pocket, if you will make it an unqualified legal tender, I will regard it as a title-deed to all the labor of the country, to all the mines in the country, and to all the lands in the country to the extent of the dollar itself. That is the meaning of it.

But we are told that the greenback is a piece of paper, that it is "rag money." So are your bonds "rag money." The American Constitution is on paper; the title-deed to your land is on paper. But all these are symbols which represent something that you can repose upon; and there is not an American citizen to-day who is afraid to lean upon the strong arm of his Government, for it will not waver beneath him in its currency, particularly in making good every one of its Treasury notes.

Why, sir, during the war of 1812–1814, in the Mexican war, and in all the wars we have had since, the Treasury note has been the champion of the prowess of the nation. Your gold has fled from the country and burrowed in the ground. The greenback, representing the nation's faith, has gone forth with our Army and Navy to victory.

I have stated that the Government has depreciated the Treasury note. It only remains for the Government to re-enact the law of 1846, making the revenues of the Government collectable in gold and silver or Treasury notes, and it will come to its equation. Such a measure will fall like a bursting bomb into Wall street, and will blow up all their gambling-shops, and the currency will be relieved from its fluctuations as compared with gold and silver. Othello's occupation will be gone.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RIDDLE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee be permitted to finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am much obliged for the courtesy of the House. As gentlemen are aware, I have not troubled the House before this session, and I do not know that I shall do so again. I therefore beg indulgence while I finish my remarks. I promise to make them as brief as possible.

Let me pursue the question a little further; let me present another aspect of this case, and show the country one of the reasons of the war that is made upon the currency of the national faith. Though there is a clamor for the payment of all the bonds of the United States in gold under the act of 1869, I wish to call the attention of Representatives to one feature of that law, and it is this: that the faith of the Government is pledged to the payment of these bonds in "coin or its equivalent." Now at the time that law was under discussion it was never contemplated that, should the greenback currency of the United States ever come to par with gold and silver, it should not be used in the solution of the bonded debt. Do you understand it? Do you see why it is that they wish to get clear of the legal-tender notes of the United States? Do you see why it is that they wish to supersede these notes as rapidly as possible? For when you make them by law receivable as gold and silver, they will rise to the value of gold and silver; they will be the equivalent of gold and silver, and your bonds will be solvable in legal-tenders without depreciation. But the policy has been to put it out of the power of the Government to pay off this indebtedness in its own money according to contract. It has been the policy to wind cord after cord of legislation around the people, until you have bound them hand and foot, and abandoned them a prey to the heartless exactions of a pampered avarice.

Suppose that Treasury notes should come to a par with gold and silver; suppose that your bonds should be solved in legal-tender, being the equal of gold and silver, and what would be the condition of the country then? There would be a solution, there would be an outlet; there you could find elasticity. If you should have too many legal-tenders, the taxing powers of this Government could absorb them; they could be carried to your destruction account, leaving just enough for the wants of the people and without detriment to anybody.

In addition to this, the banks of the country can bank upon them as well as upon any other capital, and with far greater safety to the people than the present national-bank circulation.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that it is unsafe to intrust Congress with the power of issuing Treasury notes, and it is gravely argued here in this House by gentlemen who would aspire to fill the White House that Congress is not to be intrusted with this power. Why? Because it is supposed that here is a wild, corruptible, and inflammable body of legislators, who are not to be intrusted with the financial affairs of the nation, which is one of the highest acts of sovereignty. Why did you not make the same objection to their being intrusted with the taxing powers of the Government; the war-making power of the Government; the administrative powers of the Government; the legislative exposition of the Constitution of the United States? Why did you permit all these things, and still complain that Congress is presumed to be a licentious body and is not to be intrusted with this power? Was there ever a more impudent proposition? And what would you do with a great power which contains such danger to the people of this country that a great and enlightened body of representatives of the people are not to be intrusted with it? What would you do with it? Why, you would tear it away from the Government of the United States, to do what with it? Lug it along and lay it down to irresponsible corporations and abandon the whole field to them, leaving the Government and the people without a currency at all, except as administered by these corporations. Ridiculous? Why, it is the acme of the ridiculous to maintain such a proposition. Just hear what Mr. Benton said on that subject in his Thirty Years' View, volume 1, page 450. He said:

> The Government ought not to delegate this power if it could. It was too great a power to be trusted to any banking company whatever, or to any authority but the highest and most responsible which was known to our form of government.
> The Government itself ceases to be independent; it ceases to be safe when the national currency is at the will of a company. The Government can undertake no great enterprise, neither of war nor peace, without the consent and co-operation of that company; it cannot count its revenues for six months ahead without referring to the action of that company—its friendship or its enmity its concurrence or opposition—to see how far that company will permit money to be scarce or to be plenty; how far it will let the money system go on regularly or throw it into disorder; how far it will suit the interests or policy of that company to create a tempest or suffer a calm in the moneyed ocean. The people are not safe when such a company has such a power. The temptation is too great, the opportunity too easy, to put up and put down prices; to make and break fortunes; to bring the whole community upon its knees to the Neptunes who preside over the flux and reflux of paper. All property is at their mercy. The price of real estate, of every growing crop, of every staple article in the market, is at their command. Stocks are their playthings—their gambling theater, on which they gamble daily with as little secrecy and as little morality, and far more mischief to fortunes, than common gamblers carry on their operations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let that group of appalling objections to such transfer of powers strike and startle not only this body, but the American nation, with the vast surrender of powers they have made to those corporations. Would that my voice could ring trumpet-tongued throughout this nation. I would arouse the people from their nightmare slumber to a sense of their endangered liberties and industries. One other idea. I call upon this House to bear witness to the fact that during the various issues of the Treasury notes of the United States where is the man who has lost a single dollar by virtue of the issuance of one of those notes? Another picture. We have had nine bank panics in the United States, and it can be verified by the best authority that it has cost the people a thousand millions of dollars to get through with each one of these bank panics, being a loss of $9,000,000,000 the people have suffered at the hands of the banks, while not one dollar has been lost because of Treasury notes. Who is afraid of the comparison? Where is the danger? Who would mislead the people?

What did President Grant say on the subject in his Cowdrey letter, October 6, 1873?

No one now distrusts the value of his paper dollar; on the contrary, it is seized and hoarded with the same avidity now that the gold dollar has been in former like adversities.

Who distrusts these Treasury notes? Who is it? Where is the skeptic? With his shriveled lips of scorn crying out rag money to the democratic party, when he is advocating and pandering to the only rag-money institutions in this country, the rag currency, not money, in this country—the national banks. Are they money? No; they are not. Have they the nation's stamp upon them any further than to secure the redemption of the circulating notes and to receive them for certain revenues? No; they are not money in any of its essential features, except that they are received by the people through the operation of the forces of Government. In that way they become quasi money, and only in that way.

But I have not done with this subject quite yet. Bear with me a little, Representatives, if you please, as I propose now to call the attention of the House to some facts which I think ought to go before the country. We find we had some financiers who imagined that the gold basis was to be reached through the contraction of the currency of the country.

On the 31st of August, 1865, the public debt reached its highest point, as appears from finance report, 1867, pages 3 and 4, the most of which was used as a currency. The following issues were so used:

Temporary loans	$107,148,713
Certificates of indebtedness	85,033,000
Five per cent. legal-tender notes	34,954,230
Coin interest legal-tender notes	217,924,160
Seven-thirty notes	830,000,000
United States notes, legal-tenders	433,160,000
Fractional currency	26,344,742
Cash in Treasury	88,218,055
Total United States currency	1,820,922,200
National bank	131,452,000
State bank notes	240,000,000
Total circulation 31st of August, 1865	2,192,395,627
Add confederate treasury notes	450,000,000
Confederate notes perished:
Amount of currency, November 1, 1875	762,204,483
Contraction apparent	1,430,191,144

By act of June 3, 1864, Revised Statutes, section 3476, it is provided that:

Treasury notes bearing interest may be paid to any creditor of the United States at their face value, excluding interest, or to any creditor willing to receive them at par, including interest.

Mr. McCulloch said:

A very large portion of which were in circulation as currency * * * of which $654,138,949 were a legal tender, to wit, United States notes, $433,160,569; 5 per cent. notes, $34,954,230; compound-interest notes, $217,024,160.

But the following table will show the true condition of the Treasury at this time:

Estimate of currency compiled from reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, 1875, page 47, &c., by Judge Martin and amended by myself.

Fractional currency		$40,681,629
Old demand notes		69,707
National-bank notes		348,216,902
Legal-tender notes		373,236,244
Aggregate		762,204,482
Reduction of currency in 1875:
Fractional currency	$6,704,069
Old demand notes	5,707
National-bank notes	3,710,264
Further reduction of legal-tender notes up to May 31, 1876, as per Comptroller's statement	3,112,576
National-bank notes to same date	13,588,746
The following currency is taken out of circulation:

It thus appears that the amount in actual circulation is only $230,000,000. And for what purpose? I will repeat a summary which I had occasion to produce in a speech addressed to the House on the 28th of March, 1874:

To spread over illimitable territory; to distribute among forty-five millions of people; to furnish money for the salable part of $40,000,000,000 of property; to pay national, State, county, city, corporation, and individual indebtedness amounting to $10,000,000,000; to pay for the marketable part of $10,000,000,000 of annual productions; to pay annual taxation, United States, State, county, and town, $611,000,000; to pay annual interest on the public and private debt, $500,000,000; to pay for the annual construction and operation of railroads, $1,000,000,000; to pay for annual imports into the United States, $642,000,000; to pay for the support of schools, colleges, churches, book concerns, newspapers; for building houses and towns, founding new States, and to pay for the personal expenses of the millions who move every day upon the railroads and public thoroughfares, $500,000,000 more.

And still we hear the cry of contraction, contraction! Contraction is the relief of all our woes; while upon the other hand, your country, your population is in expansion, your productions in expansion, and your wants in expansion, and moving with race-horse speed in the opposite direction, while you would compress and bind and cripple every expanding industry in the country. An absurd proposition, to say the most and the best for it, with due respect to those who advocate the doctrine.

As evidence that we have not enough money, let any individual cast his eye across the country. Why do you see your commerce languishing? Why do you see your commerce now blushing before the commerce of other countries? Why do you look upon your mute mills and manufacturing establishments? Why does the nation bow its ear in vain to hear the dull thunder of its looms and the rumbling of its machinery? Why does the nation look upon so many laborers and operatives who have been expelled from the fields and shops and mills, and wandering as vagrants through the country and through your streets, and with their children clamoring for bread and clothed in rags and tatters? Why is it that you see your lands depreciated in their value, and your productions reduced in a corresponding ratio? Why so many houses sold to meet the taxes of the state? Why are all these things? And why is there a clamor rising from the mouths of the millions, deep-toned, admonishing the country that there is something financially, criminally wrong in the administration of the monetary affairs of this country?

Representatives, you have only heard the crepitation of the volcano; soon you will hear the explosion of the crater unless there is relief. And it is wise to give that relief before the lava is thrown high and far over hill and plain in scorching, consuming fires upon the authors of the people's wrongs.

Tell me that contraction is the remedy! Ay, sir, this Government owes its people relief and protection against bankruptcy and ruin as much as to defend them from personal violence. And if any man stands in the way of it, whether he thinks he is innocent or not, the people will visit a terrible retribution upon him or the party that dares to withhold justice and their due demands from them.

No, Mr. Chairman, it is unavailing to point us to New York and tell us that they have an abundance there. No, sir; it is only the apoplexy in the head while there is pining atrophy in the limbs. The blood is all in coagulum in the veins. Financial death has seized upon the country and relief must be had. Give the people their own money, the nation's money, the nation's faith, the nation's blood; and let it circulate and you will soon see the blood going to the extremities and returning to the heart, and its quick and bounding pulsations, with the ruddy glow of health upon the nation's cheek, will admonish us that all is well and the people prosperous and happy.

But there is another idea to which I wish to call the attention of the House. It is this: That if you wish a contented and prosperous and happy people you must give them currency enough or facility to obtain it; you must let the taxing powers of the Government rest easily, lightly, and equally upon them, so that they will bear the burdens of the Government like heaven's atmosphere all expanded over them, without bearing harder upon one than upon another. As Mr. Hamilton said:

The ability of a country to pay taxes must always be proportioned in a great degree to the quantity of money in circulation and to the celerity with which it circulates.

There is another fact to which I wish to call the attention of the House. You may talk a great deal about the balance of trade between this country and foreign countries. I have a statistical table here elaborately prepared by Mr. Grosvenor in his excellent work. Does Protection Protect? It is as follows:

Morement of currency and imports compared.

Year.	Currency.	Imports.	Per capita.

The above table shows that the imports of this Government for the last thirty years, or since 1829, have kept their relative position to the quantity of the currency in the country. And why so? Because the quantity of money is the purchasing power of the people, and the consuming capacity will be limited by the purchasing power. Hence, you find that we have had a contraction within the last twelve months of thirty-odd millions of dollars as shown here. More than that even, you find that the Secretary of the Treasury reports that within the last year there has been a falling off in the revenues from customs of $5,936,111.34. You find that it is true to this law. And you may contract the currency still, and you will find that the imports will decrease. And what is the result of that? Another important truth for this nation to know is that whenever your revenues diminish from such articles as are subject to taxation, you have to increase the burden of taxation upon something else, and with a diminished currency you have an oppressed and clamoring and a distressed people, a people on the highway to national bankruptcy.

That is the result of it; but in regard to that section of the country, those that produce the staples for foreign market, whenever you increase your import duties the foreign merchant who buys the raw material tells the producer that he cannot pay him a high price for his production and export it to his own country and manufacture it and pay for its re-shipment, and subject to high customs duties.

In this way the increased tariff reduces the price of the raw material, resulting in this condition of things—that there is a low price for the raw material and a high price for the articles consumed; that is the unequal and grinding effect of the system of contraction on the country. It is that which afflicts the country. The country is in an agony under it. These burdens must be removed by a change in our whole financial system. Industry must be unshackled, and if not unshackled, sooner or later, I believe that this House will be swept as by a besom by the people, and other Representatives will be put here who will respond to the wants and distresses of the country.

I wish to say another word in behalf of my section of the country, if you will pardon me, in relation to its distress, and that distress is intimately connected with your prosperity. I have heretofore stated to our northern friends that you may destroy the industry of that section of the country, but, like the dead Siamese twin, it will spread mortification to every industry you have. Now, there have been some legislative blunders committed in relation to that section of the country and its prosperity. It emerged desolate and forlorn from the war, with its labor system prostrated, with its currency destroyed, its people in debt, and with the necessity devolving upon them of repairing their railroads and means of transportation, and before long they found themselves $500,000,000 in debt at an annual interest of $30,000,000. They are without farming implements, without manufactories, without the means of clothing themselves, or supplying themselves with other articles of consumption; all these things had to be brought from another portion of the country, and all the money that they could realize from their productions was sent north for the purpose of buying articles to consume; for the purpose of buying agricultural implements, for the purpose of paying the interest on their private and public debts, and the money going from them never to return. One sad result is that before twelve months shall roll around, although my own State of Tennessee is as prosperous as any Southern State, 10,000 individuals in that State will have the shelter sold from over their heads to pay the interest upon these bonds.

Now, sir, this condition of affairs has been superinduced in part by legislation. I say it not with a view of recrimination, but simply to recount a blunder. Here was a cotton tax levied of $70,000,000. The people found that they could not pay the interest on the debt and engage in this production and support themselves, and the consequence was that they were driven from the cotton-fields and the rice and sugar plantations to raise breadstuffs for their own support.

Now, listen to another important fact, you men of the West, you Representatives of the West—listen to another important fact in connection with this matter; in 1859-'60 this section of the country to which I have alluded produced 4,861,291 bales of cotton. In 1872 it produced 3,930,508 bales of cotton. Why this falling off? Prior to that time there had been a regular progression in proportion to the population and area of country, and if that progression had been kept up there should have been 7,000,000 bales of cotton produced last year, and with wise legislation there would have been that production, and that product would have brought into the country gold from foreign markets, which would have been sent to the West in exchange for the products of its grain-fields. I give here a table showing the production of cotton in the United States from the year 1840 until the year 1873:

The result of the legislation of Congress was that a few years ago you had to make fuel of your grain because you were deprived of your market.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Was not the production of cotton last year greater than ever before in the history of the country?

Mr. BRIGHT. No, sir; it was not.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Was it not about 5,000,000 bales?

Mr. BRIGHT. Well, it may have risen nearly to that amount.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Five million bales?

Mr. BRIGHT. Yes, sir; but by this time it ought to have risen to the amount of 7,000,000 bales, and with proper legislation and industry you would have had that amount; it would have been so if you had legislated in the interest of industry instead of the money power, which has been gripping the life out of our people and yours.

Mr. Chairman, I will draw my remarks to a close as fast as I can. I am very much obliged to the House for their patient indulgence, and I only desire to call attention to another fact or two.

We have heard a great deal upon the subject of specie resumption, all looking to that end as the halcyon age, the golden age. Let us consider a few facts in relation to that matter. According to the reports that have been made upon the subject we have of gold and silver coin in the country $140,000,000, all told. The Government needs of that $132,000,000 for the purpose of paying the interest upon the bonds and for the sinking fund. That would leave $8,000,000 for the purpose of furnishing a banking capital and a general circulation and for all the other wants of a period of gold resumption.

Now, let us examine into the possibility of this thing. Our interest-bearing national debt abroad amounts to about $1,600,000,000 gold, to say the least; some place it as high as $2,000,000,000. The interest upon that amount, taking it at its minimum, is $100,000,000 a year. Our carrying trade in foreign vessels, which has to be paid in gold, is $60,000,000, as estimated by Mr. Grosvenor; and we lose by smuggling and undervaluation of invoices some $50,000,000; making $210,000,000 of money balance against us, not a trade balance. There is no delusion in a money balance, no shifting of invoices that will correct it, because it is an inflexible thing. You have $210,000,000 of a gold money balance against you.

Of annual production of gold and silver we have a total of $63,000,000, of gold only about $40,000,000. Put them together, and you have a money balance of $147,000,000 against you, and increasing every day.

Now, how will you get to your gold basis under your financial system? Have you not been trying it for a number of years? Has not your golden Pactolus swept by you only to delude you and pass to a foreign country? Have you not been rolling the stone of Sisyphus without reaching the top? Have you not been attempting to sip the retreating wave of Tantalus? And, instead of getting nearer to the golden shore, you have been driven farther away out into the ocean, the unknown sea. Where is the arithmetic that will calculate you back to the golden-resumption shore upon which you hope to land?

In 1870 the gold premium was 10 per cent., and now it is 14 per cent.

You have attempted it by what was called the contraction system. Just let me call attention to one absurdity in relation to that matter. The Government depreciated the value of the legal-tender note by not receiving it for interest on the public debt nor for customs duties, but making coin an exclusive tender for that purpose. The consequence is that the Government made the distinction between your legal-tender notes and your coin. I predict here that you may destroy your currency down to two dollars, one of greenback and one of gold, and there will be as great a disparity between the legal-tender note and gold dollar as now.

The gold dollar will be needed by the Government to pay the interest on the national debt, and by the importer to pay his customs dues; the legal tender will not do. And when the merchant takes a legal-tender note to buy a gold dollar he will have to pay the difference, that is all. I thus show the absurdity of this contraction theory. Two unequal things in law can never be made equal. Mr. McCulloch, in 1866, said he thought resumption could be reached in 1868. In his report in 1867 he said that resumption ought not be delayed beyond the 1st of January, or at the latest the 1st of July, 1869. Congress arrested his theory, and the Comptroller, Mr. Hulburd, in his report of 1871 said that "the doctrine of contraction as a means to an end for the purpose of hastening a return to specie payments has been condemned by the people. It has been tried and rejected, and may be considered as abandoned."

The CHAIRMAN. The second hour of the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I move that the time of the gentleman be further extended.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will be through in a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman will be extended.

There was no objection, and the time was extended.

Mr. BRIGHT. Secretary BOUTWELL and Secretary Richardson pursued the golden phantom. Secretary Bristow and President Grant are bent on reaching it by the 1st of January, 1879. Still, with all your efforts, you have not increased a single gold dollar within the last fifteen years. Now you add the gold-resumption act of 1875, providing for resumption in 1879; and what is the result? You find the national banks and the national industries clawing off from resumption as the mariner claws off from the lee shore when he knows that shipwrecks and dangers lie there. Still they sing the siren song of contraction, and would endeavor to hide their sophistries under their dazzling rhetoric.

But it is of no avail. The American people are not to be deceived in this matter. You cannot argue a man in want into the belief that he has an abundance. How does a man know that he wants bread when he is starving? How does a man know that he wants clothing when he is naked? How does a man know that he wants money when he is in penury? It is by experience. One fact is worth a whole ship-load of sophistical arguments.

But we are told again, as an argument to the people to go for contraction, go for hoarding money. You can have your deposits in the savings-banks and in the national banks. And when you get down to a gold basis, do you not see that you have found the philosopher's stone, that you have struck a bonanza, and are going to convert all into gold at once? Shame upon the hypocrisy of the argument, when there is not currency enough in the United States to pay the deposits in the savings-banks; and they may thank Heaven if they ever get their money back in good legal-tenders, or from the national banks either.

A few other facts, and I will draw my remarks to a close. So far as this question of specie resumption is concerned, the policy of the Government has been to get further and further from resumption. In the first place, it funded its floating debt and made the interest payable in coin. Then in 1869 it passed a law to make the principal payable in coin or its equivalent, increasing the debt $500,000,000. On the 12th of February, 1873, it demonetized silver and limited payment to gold, so far as to make the means of payment scarcer than before. It expelled the gold from the country to pay a foreign debt by unwise legislation. As I showed in a speech of January 25, 1875, the Government has paid as principal and interest on the public debt about $1,800,000,000 in gold, when it might have been paid in silver, saving $200,000,000 to the people. Again, the specie value of the nation's debt in 1865 was about $1,200,000,000. We have already paid $1,800,000,000 in gold; and it will yet, according to the same process, take $9,000,000,000 more to wipe out the national debt; and it will yet take $25,000,000,000 more of taxation, according to the scale adopted, in order to raise the revenues for that portion taken from it to pay the national debt.

There is one other fact to which I wish to allude. This demonetization of silver, which I developed more than twelve months ago, was so artfully done that I do not believe the President of the United States knew the effect of the bill which he was signing. Why do I say so? In February, 1873, the silver dollar was demonetized; it dropped from the coins of the nation; and six months after that, in October, 1873, as appears by Mr. McPherson's Hand-book of Politics for 1873, General Grant in a letter to Mr. Cowdrey said:

> The panic has brought greenbacks about to a par with silver. I wonder that silver is not already coming into the market to supply the deficiency in the circulating medium. When it does come, and I predict that it will soon, we will have made a rapid stride toward specie payments. Currency will never go below silver after that. The circulation of silver will have other beneficial effects. Experience has proved that it takes about forty millions of fractional currency to make small change necessary for the transaction of the business of the country. Silver will gradually take the place of this currency, and, further, will become the standard of values which will be hoarded in a small way. I estimate that this will consume from two to three hundred millions, in time, of this species of our circulating medium. It will leave the paper currency free to perform the legitimate functions of trade, and will tend to bring us back where we must come at last, to a specie basis. I confess to a desire to see a limited hoarding of money. It insures a firm foundation in time of need. But I want to see the hoarding of something that has a standard of value the world over. Silver has this, and if we once get back to that our strides toward a higher appreciation of our currency will be rapid. Our mines are now producing almost unlimited amounts of silver, and it is becoming a question, "What shall we do with it?" I suggest here a solution that will answer for some years, and suggest to you bankers whether you may not imitate it: To put it in circulation now; keep it there until it is fixed, and then we will find other markets.

That was the language of President Grant after he had signed the bill demonetizing the silver dollar, showing how artfully that was done. As I demonstrated, the bonds were certainly payable in silver coin at that time; and if they had been so paid, $200,000,000 might have been saved to the American people. That act was a criminal blunder upon the part of our legislators, an oversight that ought to be remedied as soon as possible. If the silver dollar were now in circulation, it would furnish another facility for discharging the national debt. Let us have the trinity of financial power here: gold, silver, and Treasury notes; the Treasury note to supplement any and all deficiencies of the Government and people. As to the quantity of Treasury notes that might be needed, it would rest on the demand, like any other commodity. Mr. Calhoun said in his speech in 1837, before alluded to: "On what, then, ought a paper currency to rest? I would say on demand and supply simply, which regulates everything else, the constant demand which the Government has on the community for its necessary supplies."

One other remark. Whatever may be said about it, gold is as uncertain in its price as anything else and as uncertain in its movements. You may think that you have a gold basis for your banks; but let a panic come or a revolution in Europe take place, and away will go the bottom out of your banks. Not only so, but gold and silver always flow from a debtor nation to a creditor nation; and ours being $1,600,000,000 in debt, you cannot bind gold and silver here; they go from us by an inevitable law. It was unwise legislation that sent the precious metals away from us. It was not the democratic party that expelled them; and there must be some change in the system before there will be any absolute change for the better in the financial condition of the country.

Now, as showing that gold is liable to fluctuation and that the quantity of currency afloat has no absolute control over it, let me read the language of Mr. Fessenden, one of the most enlightened Secretaries of the Treasury that we ever had. I ask the House to listen to his words of wisdom. In his report on the finances in 1864 he said, on pages 22 and 23:

> The experience of the past few months cannot have failed to convince the most careless observer that, whatever may be the effect of a redundant circulation upon the price of coin, other causes have exercised a greater and more deleterious influence. In the course of a few days the price of this article rose from about $1.50 to $2.85 in paper for $1 in specie, and subsequently fell, in as short a period, to $1.87, and then again rose, as rapidly, to $2.50; and all without any assignable cause, traceable to an increase or decrease in the circulation of paper money, or an expansion or contraction of credit, or other similar influence on the market, tending to occasion a fluctuation so violent. It is quite apparent that the solution of the problem may be found in the unpatriotic and criminal efforts of speculators, and probably of secret enemies, to raise the price of coin, regardless of the injury inflicted upon the country, or desiring to inflict it.

What a stab to the speculators and the secret enemies of the country! Who is keeping up the artificial distinction now but your gold gamblers in Wall street who have "cornered" the Government, who have given occasion for your "black Fridays," who have produced financial revulsions, and made gold more unstable by a hundred per cent. than your legal-tender note, which is more stable than anything else because the credit of the Government is more stable?

But why this reckless haste to reach specie resumption? To show the hypocrisy of the roaring advocates of a speedy resumption, why do they not go to banking on gold under the national-banking act, which authorizes an unlimited number of gold banks? And yet, passing strange, there is not one gold bank east of the Rocky Mountains. Why do they not advocate the payment of all the State taxes in gold, as it they might do, because the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Lane vs. The State of Oregon, decided that a State may collect its taxes in coin. Let him advocate the payment of the State bonds and private debts in gold. Let such an advocate become a candidate before a distressed people, and he would find that he would be without voters, except bondholders, who want their debts paid in gold. And the bondholders have no right to complain; because they were permitted to fund their depreciated paper into gold-interest-bearing bonds; because they secured an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to prevent the repudiation of their debt; because they secured the passage of the act of March, 1869, making the principal of their bonds payable in coin or its equivalent, securing an advantage of $500,000,000; because they secured the passage of the act of February 12, 1873, demonetizing the silver dollar, thereby forcing the Government to pay them in the scarcer and more costly gold coin; because they have already received $1,800,000,000 in gold, which is fully equal to the gold value of the original debt against the Government. But yet, like the insatiate giant Polyphemus, they would devour the resources of the country, as he eat up the crew of Ulysses, so clean that—

No entrails, blood, nor solid bone remains.

Mr. Chairman, how will we reach the result so much desired of bringing the Government back to a gold and silver basis? Will it be by forced resumption? Mr. Benton says:

Specie derivable from foreign commerce, added to the quantity of gold derivable from our mines, were fully sufficient, if not expelled from the country by unwise laws, to furnish the people with an abundant circulation of gold and silver coin for the common currency, without having recourse to a circulation of small bank-notes. (1 Benton, 438–9.)

Mr. Schenck says it must come in consequence of wise and wholesome legislation. Mr. McCulloch condemned forced resumption as of no avail. President Grant, in his first annual message, contended that a forced resumption would ruin the debtor class.

I will tell you how to reach the result. Repeal your resumption act; strike the fetters from the industries of the country and encourage them; wind up your national banks; make the country free; employ gold, silver, and Treasury notes in the payment of taxes, duties, and national debt; let our enormous productions, which are gathering head and pressing hard against our tariff blockades, burst through and find vent to the open seas; let 10,000 American argosies climb the mountain waves of every sea; let them touch at every island, land on every coast, sweep every continent, feel around Arctic and Antarctic, gather up the wealth of the Old World, with the gold and the silver, and bring them back and empty them into the lap of our own country, and these mingling with the precious metals from our own mines, and we will have reached the specie basis, and not before.

I thank the House for its unusual indulgence and attention.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, at an early day in the session I had the privilege of introducing a resolution, which was adopted by the House, directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report what legislation, if any, is necessary to secure the payment of the "subsidy bonds" issued by the United States to the so-called Pacific railroad companies, and for the payment of which the Government is responsible. From that day to this I have pursued the subject with all the industry and energy I could command, and after delays which I could neither avert nor control, largely interposed by the railroad companies, the Committee on the Judiciary have agreed upon a bill which I will read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3672) to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein mentioned.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall at all times withhold payment of any money due from the United States to any railroad company which has received any gift or grant of land, or grant of a right of way or easement, or gift or loan of money or credit from the United States, whether such money so due be reduced to judgment or not, to the amount of any and all claims due from such company to the United States.

SEC. 2. That in any action or proceeding brought in pursuance of law by any such company against the United States, any claim or demand in favor of the United States against such company may, at the election of the United States, be a set-off, and pleaded as such, or may be made the subject of a separate action or actions in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. That all claims and demands for money due the United States from any such company, from the time they respectively become due, if payment be unreasonably withheld, shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the several railroad companies to which bonds were issued under any of the several acts of which this act is amendatory to provide a sinking fund for the payment, according to law, of the interest and principal of such bonds, and for re-imbursing the United States for such sums as have been, and may from time to time be, advanced and paid by the United States upon such bonds and interest, and which may not be re-imbursed from compensation for services as now provided by law, and from 5 per cent. of net earnings. And for the purpose of providing such sinking fund said companies shall severally be required to pay into the Treasury of the United States, in addition to the said compensation for services and 5 per cent. of net earnings, the following annual installments, to wit: The Union Pacific Railroad Company shall, during the period of ten years from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, pay annually into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $750,000, to be paid one-half on July 1 and the other half on January 1 in each of said years. And during each and every year commencing with the expiration of said period of ten years, the said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall pay into the Treasury of the United States $1,000,000, until the whole amount of bonds issued to said company, together with interest, shall have been fully paid, one-half of each annual installment to be paid on the 1st of July and the other half on the 1st of January. And the said Central Pacific Railroad Company, on its own account and on account of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, shall, during the period of ten years from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, pay annually into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $568,210, to be paid one half on July 1 and the other half on January 1 in each of said years. And during each and every year, commencing with the expiration of said period of ten years, the said Central Pacific Railroad Company shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $760,330, until the whole amount of bonds issued to said company, together with interest, shall have been fully paid, one-half of each annual installment to be paid on the 1st day of July and the other half on the 1st day of January: Provided, That the sums paid into the sinking fund under this act shall apply first to the extinguishment of interest, and the balance to the principal of the aforesaid bonds. And there shall be paid into the Treasury on account of said sinking fund annually, one-half on the 1st day of July and the other half on the 1st day of January in each year, by the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, $87,327; by the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, $22,297; and by the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, $20,723, until the bonds issued to said companies respectively, and the interest thereon, shall be fully paid. And said several companies shall owe and be indebted to the United States in the several sums required to be by them respectively paid as aforesaid. And any company may pay any sum herein required to be paid in bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par, [or in first-mortgage bonds issued by any of said companies.]

The total sum required to be paid by any company in any one year by virtue of this act, and including said 5 per cent. of net earnings and said compensation for services as now required by law, shall not exceed the several sums following, to wit: By the Central Pacific Railroad Company, on its own account, $1,861,484, and on account of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, $113,538; the Union Pacific Railroad Company, $1,989,462; the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, $489,034; the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, $124,856; and the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, $116,050.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest to the best advantage the money paid into the Treasury or collected in pursuance of this act on account of said sinking funds in any bonds issued by the United States, [or in the first-mortgage bonds issued by any of said companies,] and to re-invest the same from time to time with all interest and profits and hold the same for the purpose of said sinking funds, respectively, and at the maturity of the bonds issued to said railroad companies to sell, dispose of, or otherwise apply said money and bonds, at not less than their par value, to the credit of said sinking funds, respectively, in paying and canceling said bonds issued to said companies and the interest thereon advanced by the United States not already re-imbursed. But nothing herein shall require said 5 per cent. of net earnings or said one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government to be invested as herein mentioned.

SEC. 6. That if any such railroad company shall fail to pay any money or claim due or to become due the United States, or payable in pursuance of this act, such company shall be liable to an action therefor in any court of competent jurisdiction, at the suit of the United States. And it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to institute the necessary suits and proceedings to collect said money and claims so due or payable, and otherwise obtain redress in respect of the same, and prosecute the same with all convenient dispatch to a final determination. And all such suits and proceedings shall have precedence in the courts over other cases.

SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any such railroad company, or director, officer, or agent thereof, to make or pay, or cause or authorize to be made or paid, any dividend from the earnings, profits, or resources of such company, so long as such company may for sixty days be in default in paying to the United States any money due and owing by such company to the United States, in pursuance of this or any act relating to such company or otherwise, the payment of which has been demanded of such company by the Secretary of the Treasury. Every person receiving such dividend shall be liable to refund the same to the United States; and every director, officer, or agent of such company who shall violate any provision of this section shall be individually and personally liable to account and to pay to the United States the whole amount of such dividend.

SEC. 8. That no director or officer of any company hereinbefore mentioned or referred to shall hereafter be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract therewith, except for his lawful compensation as such officer. And every such person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both of said punishments may be inflicted.

SEC. 9. That any remedy herein provided shall not be deemed to deny, exclude, or impair any other heretofore existing in favor of the United States. And nothing herein contained shall affect any pending suit instituted under the fourth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873. And nothing herein shall be deemed a waiver of the power and right of Congress at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this or any other act relating to any such railroad company; but such right and power are reserved to Congress. And nothing herein shall impair any right existing by law under the first-mortgage bonds issued under the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled, "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862." And nothing herein shall be deemed a waiver of any right which the United States may have.

[The words in brackets indicate amendments suggested for consideration.]

THE REAL QUESTION.

The real question presented in this bill is this: Shall the so-called Pacific railroad companies from their abundant means and resources provide for the payment of $145,000,000 to the United States which they have promised to pay for a full and fair consideration or shall this vast sum be lost to the Government, and thus be unjustly transferred from the pockets of the people to the coffers of these great corporations?

I shall endeavor to show that this is the real question, and that the measure proposed is alike just, reasonable, necessary, and fully authorized by the express sanction and agreement of the railroad companies interested.

It rarely happens that any one bill involves so vast an amount of money as this. Its magnitude in this respect, as in the questions it presents, has secured for it more consideration by the Judiciary Committee than any one bill in this Congress, and after long and careful investigation at last it comes before the House with the sanction and approval of the committee. It now awaits the action of the House.

THE LOBBY.

Before proceeding to state in detail what the bill is, a few words may be proper as furnishing reasons why members on this floor should examine the measure for themselves, without accepting unconsidered all that has been and may be said outside of this Hall in opposition to it.

These great railroad companies are vast agencies for good, and they should always have a liberal measure of consideration and of justice. But it must not be forgotten that they have sometimes secured legislative concessions which in the light of experience have been unwise, if not worse, and they have resisted just legislation demanded by the public interest. This should admonish the House to scrutinize with care the demands the companies now make.

The vice-president of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, in a letter of May 15 to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee in opposing this bill, says that—

Realizing fully the enormous disadvantage at which an individual or a corporation stands as against the Government, we appeal to the representatives of the States and of the people.

As a matter of fact, the advantages are all the other way. It should be borne in mind that while the Government and people have no lobby or counsel to represent them in or out of committee these companies have both, in opposition to this bill, selected for their great learning and ability; some, it may be, for their political and personal influence, and so distributed geographically as to "do the most good." This gives the companies the advantage of supplying by the persuasive power of argument all that can be said in their behalf; and yet they defy the order of this House requiring them to register with the Clerk the names of these attorneys and agents, so that it may be known to all how far their advice is disinterested.

We have seen the effect of the persuasive power of these agencies on other and memorable occasions—occasions to which I need not now refer. (House Report No. 78, third session Forty-second Congress, page 189, 227; also Credit Mobilier report, same session, No. 77.)

But they all show that in a legislative contest almost every advantage is with the companies and against the Government.

This bill has been met at every step with a power of argument, with a determined opposition, with urgent and successful appeals for delay, such as no other measure has encountered.

The lobby in opposition to it swarm in the corridors of the Capitol, besiege the committee-room where it is considered, and appeal in public and private to individual members of Congress with arguments against it.

No such agencies are here in behalf of the Government and people, whose interests the bill is designed to protect.

THE MATERIAL FACTS.

And now I proceed to a statement of some facts material to be kept in mind and necessary in a discussion of the bill.

The act of Congress of July 1, 1862, created "The Union Pacific Railroad Company" as a corporation, and with other subsequent acts authorized it to construct and maintain a railroad and telegraph line from Council Bluffs, in Iowa, to a point five miles west of Ogden, in Utah, a distance of 1,085.88 miles.

By the same acts the Central Pacific Company, a California corporation, was authorized to construct a similar railroad and telegraph line from the western terminus of the Union Pacific road to Sacramento, a distance of 737.50 miles, and, as consolidated with the Western Pacific from Sacramento to San José, 123 16, or in all 860.66.

To enable these companies to construct these roads the act of 1862 proposed to loan them Government bonds, known as "subsidy bonds," payable thirty years after date, with 6 per cent. currency interest, the payment of the principal and interest to be secured to the Government by a first mortgage on the roads, and it proposed to give alternate sections of Government lands to the companies.

By the act of July 2, 1864, the land grant was doubled, the companies were authorized to issue bonds secured by mortgage on their respective roads, to be made a first lien, equal in amount to the "subsidy bonds," and the Government first mortgage was postponed or made second to that in favor of the first-mortgage bonds which the companies were thus authorized to issue.

The same aid was rendered to and similar privileges were granted by these acts to other companies to enable them to construct branch roads tributary to the great trunk lines of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific. The bonds were all issued and lands granted under and since the act of 1864. When these laws were passed it seems to have been understood by Congress, and it was decided by the Attorney-General in December, 1870, that the companies were bound to pay the interest as it accrued semi-annually on the subsidy bonds, but it has recently been decided by the Supreme Court that the Government is required to pay this interest as it accrues, and that the companies are not obliged to repay it until the maturity of the subsidy bonds about the year 1898—about twenty-two years hence—except as this may be repaid to a limited extent annually by "5 per cent. of the net earnings" of the companies and "one-half the compensation for services" rendered the Government in carrying freights, mails, &c. (House Report No. 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress, pages 6, 120, 175, 275.)

The Supreme Court, however, did not decide that the Government would not be entitled to or that the companies could not be required to pay simple interest on the semi-annual advaces of interest from the time thereof to the maturity of the subsidy bonds. This is an open question. In order to have in one view certain information material to a correct understanding of the bill, I present the following table:

Statement of subsidies to Pacific railroads.

Names of companies.	Date of maturity of subsidy bonds.	Principal of subsidy bonds.	Simple interest to maturity, at 6 per cent., without counting any interest on advances of interest. NOTES TO PRECEDING TABLE.

(a) This would be the correct amount, assuming that the Government is not entitled to credit any sum on current interest advanced by the Government on subsidy bonds until their maturity. But the Government is entitled to credit on such advances half the railroad and telegraph services rendered by the companies to the Government at the time payment is due for such services and 5 per cent. of the net annual earnings of the companies. The requisite sinking fund would depend somewhat on these, so that the above amounts are not precisely accurate.

(b) The Central Pacific Company was aided by "subsidy bonds" on 737.50 miles, from Sacramento to Ogden; the Western Pacific on 123.16 miles, from Sacramento to San José; and these two companies are consolidated, making 860.66 miles. The Central Pacific has also been consolidated with the California and Oregon Railroad, the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda Railroad, and the San Joaquin Valley Railroad. These combined roads are all in length 1,219 miles. The reports of the Central Pacific Company show the earnings, expenditures, &c., of the one combined road, with no account kept (as it is understood) by which the earnings of the subsidy-bond-aided road can be ascertained. The proportion of 860.66 to 1,219 is not a satisfactory mode of ascertaining either earnings or expenditures. (See House Report No. 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress, pages 9, 16, 99.)

(c) In Senate Report No. 341, first session Forty-fourth Congress, it is said:

The Union Pacific Railroad Company has furnished your committee with a statement of the amounts which the company has charged to the United States for services rendered from April, 1867, to December 31, 1875.

The gross amount for these nine years is	$7,290,252 89
Average yearly amount earned in nine years	810,028 10
Of which the Government retains one-half annually	405,014 05
To this add 5 per cent. of the amounts which the company admits are net earnings by declaring a dividend of 8 per cent. upon the capital stock of $36,475,000=dividend, $2,918,000, 5 per cent. upon which is	145,900 00
Undisputed annual amount to be relied upon from the Union Pacific Railroad Company	550,014 05

The parties representing the Central Pacific Company before this committee have not at the present time obtained from California a statement of the amounts which the company have charged to the United States, and the committee, for the present purpose, uses the statement presented by the Secretary of the Treasury in Senate Executive Document No. 25, present session, page 9.

From June 30, 1870, to June 30, 1874, the gross amount for these four years is	$1,406,092 48

To this add 5 per cent. of the amount which the company admits are net earnings by declaring a dividend of 8 per cent. upon the capital stock of $34,275,500=dividend, $4,342,040, two-thirds of which arises from the road aided by the United States, $2,894,693, 5 per cent. upon which is	144,734 65

(d) Patents are probably not taken out in view of the decision of the Supreme Court that until patented the lands are not taxable. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 194. Niswanger vs. Gwynne, 20 Ohio.) This shows how section 21 of the act of July 2, 1864, apparently in the interest of the Government, was really in the interest of the companies. (Ibid, page 62.)

At the present session of Congress a bill has been passed through the House authorizing the unpatented lands to be taxed.

WHAT THE GOVERNMENT HAS GIVEN THE COMPANIES.

From this we can see something of the lavish bounty bestowed as a gift upon these corporations, useful we all admit, essential to the public interest, of more than national utility and importance, but immense in their demands on the Government; a land grant of 27,390,166 acres—an empire in extent—which should render these companies grateful to the Congress that gave it, and ready and anxious to perform every obligation. If these companies should even at the maturity of the subsidy bonds pay the aggregate of semi-annual interest advanced and to be advanced by the Government on them, the Government would still lose the interest on its advances of interest, which, compounded, amounts to the enormous sum of nearly $200,000,000, subject to comparatively small reductions by crediting "half services" of the companies to the Government and "5 per cent. of net earnings," and which in any event would probably leave more than $100,000,000, transferred in semi-annual payments through thirty years from the labor of the people to these corporations, with no return, as they claim, ever to be asked or expected. The bill now before the House asks no return for these lands—no return of this $100,000,000 of interest on advances of interest.

This is hopelessly gone—gone forever—

Gone where the woodbine twineth.

ADMITTED INDEBTEDNESS OF RAILROAD COMPANIES TO GOVERNMENT.

But these companies admit that they have agreed to pay the Government the principal of the subsidy bonds at maturity, $64,623,512; they admit their liability at the same time to pay the aggregate of interest on these bonds to that time advanced, less the credits thereon, which may in the mean time arise from half their services to the Government and 5 per cent. of their net annual earnings, if they shall ever pay any such net earnings as they have not yet, though such payments have long been due. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session; pages 6, 19, 99.)

After applying these half services and 5 per cent. of earnings there will remain to be paid the Government on the 1st of January, 1898, as nearly as may now be estimated, $144,945,833. (Ibid., 440, page 19.)

NO PROVISION FOR PAYMENT.

The companies do not claim that they are making any provision by a sinking fund or otherwise to meet this immense liability when it shall mature, nor do they deny that they are paying out in dividends to their stockholders largely the earnings of the companies while making no provision for their creditors, or at least none for the Government as a creditor.

The leading purpose of the bill now before the House is simply to require the companies to pay into the Treasury specified sums semi-annually to be invested and accumulate on interest so that at some time in the future—not so soon as the companies agreed to pay, but away beyond that—the Government may hope to be re-imbursed, so that the companies may not escape the payment of these immense millions, and thereby require them to be drawn in taxes from the labor of an already overburdened people.

But before I come directly to this feature of the bill permit me briefly to state some of its other provisions.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

The first section in substance provides as to all railroad companies which have received aid from the Government that the Secretary of the Treasury shall at all times withhold payment of any money due from the United States to such company to the amount of any and all claims due from it to the United States.

This merely extends the principle of the act of March 3, 1873, to other companies aided by the Government as well as the Pacific companies. (Report 440, page 71.)

The second section simply gives the Government a right of set-off when sued by any such company or the right to bring a separate action.

The right of set-off does not exist at common law, but is authorized in equity. It is authorized by statute in the Court of Claims. (Revised Statutes, section 1059.) This bill extends it to all courts.

The third section gives the United States a right to recover interest from any railroad company aided by the Government upon all claims for money due if payment be unreasonably withheld. If unlawfully withheld it would be unreasonably withheld. If not paid when required by law it would be unlawfully withheld.

The act of March 3, 1797, gave interest to the United States against revenue officers and persons accountable for "public money" in case of default in settlement from the time of receiving it. (1 Statutes, 512.) This does not seem to have been carried into the Revised Statutes, but they give interest in suits on bonds, (section 963,) balances due the Post-Office, (section 964,) in suits on debentures, (section 965,) on judgments in civil causes in circuit and district courts, (section 966,) and on overdue internal-revenue taxes, (sections 3184 and 3185.)

It is not necessary to say whether any other law, statutory or common, could give interest, but the committee deemed this provision at least advisable if not necessary. If these companies can escape interest on the 5 per cent. of net earnings they owe the Government, it will make it profitable to litigate and delay every payment as they are now doing.

The demand made upon them under the act of June 22, 1874, does not in terms ask for interest, though the declarations filed in the suits commenced do, and while the act itself is apparently in the interest of the Government, yet if it could be held as superseding remedies given by the act of 1862, it might be really in the interest of the companies. One misfortune of much of this railroad legislation is that it seems to point one way but leads in another.

This section is proper at least to remove all doubt.

I present a copy of the declaration and bill of particulars in the suit brought against one of these companies, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Massachusetts District, ss:

CIRCUIT COURT, May 7, 1875.

UNITED STATES
vs.
UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD CORPORATION.

Plaintiff's declaration.

And the plaintiffs say that the defendant is a corporation, duly established and existing under and by virtue of an act of the Congress of the said United States, approved July 1, A. D. 1862, and entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and by certain other acts of said Congress in addition to or in amendment of the said first-named act; that in and by said acts of Congress large privileges and great amounts of lands and bonds of the said United States were granted to the defendant corporation upon certain conditions, and were accepted upon the same conditions by said corporation; and that the said defendant corporation in its organization and establishment under said act and the acts in addition to and in amendment thereof, and by its acceptance of the said charter, privileges, and grants aforesaid; and by its assent to the act first aforesaid named, duly filed by the defendant corporation with the Department of the Interior, as required by the said act, became bound by the said conditions and obliged to perform the same; that among the said conditions and obligations which the said defendant corporation is obliged to keep and perform is the following one, namely: That after the said defendant corporation has completed its road, and until the said bonds granted by the said United States to said corporation and the interest thereon have been paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the said road shall be annually applied to the payment thereof, to wit, of the said bonds and interest.

And the plaintiffs say that said road was completed November 6, A. D. 1869, and that the said bonds and the interest thereon were not then and have not since been paid; [and that since the said date of November 6, A. D. 1869, there have been each year net earnings in the operation of said road;] and that thereupon and thereafter it became and was the duty of said defendant corporation, until said bonds and interest should be paid, to pay to the said plaintiffs annually 5 per cent. of the net earnings of said road to be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest; yet the said defendant corporation, wholly neglecting its duty in the premises, has failed and refused to pay to the plaintiffs the 5 per cent. as aforesaid, or any part thereof, for either of the years that have elapsed since said November 6, A. D. 1869, and now owes the plaintiffs the full amount thereof and interest thereon, according to the bill of particulars hereto annexed, amounting in all to the sum of $1,160,619.34.

THE SINKING-FUND PROVISIONS.

This brings us up to the most essential and main sections of the bill requiring the several companies to pay into the Treasury of the United States semi-annually a specified sum in addition to the 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services to the Government to be invested and accumulate on interest until the maturity of the subsidy bonds, when the fund is to be applied, so far as it may, in extinguishing, first, the interest on subsidy bonds then due and not re-imbursed by 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services, and then the principal, and so on until all shall be paid.

It will be seen from the table already presented that a sufficient sinking fund would require the Central Pacific to pay each year, including the 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services, about $1,861,484, and the Union Pacific $1,989,462; or, exclusive of such half services and 5 per cent., probably the Central Pacific $1,400,000, and the Union Pacific $1,500,000.

The bill as recommended in the report on this subject submitted to the House on the 25th of April required a sufficient sinking fund to meet the subsidy bonds and interest at maturity. This was modified by the committee in the bill now before us to require only in addition to the 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services from the Union Pacific company each year for ten years $750,000, and each year thereafter $1,000,000 until the subsidy bonds and interest should be paid. The corresponding sums from the Central Pacific are $568,210 and $760,330. The sinking fund required, therefore, of the Union Pacific is only about half sufficient, and that of the Central Pacific not half sufficient, to pay at maturity. At the maturity of the subsidy bonds, allowing the credits in the mean time for the "half services" and "5 per cent. of net earnings" according to the claims of the companies, not a dollar of the principal of the subsidy bonds would be paid from these sources, and the Union Pacific company would then owe for advances of interest $38,225,721.60, and the Central Pacific $39,340,224, besides the principal of the subsidy bonds.

After applying, at the maturity of the subsidy bonds, January 1, 1898, the accumulated sinking fund, as proposed in the bill, compounded at 5 per cent., besides the 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services, the Union Pacific company would then owe the United States for principal and interest of subsidy bonds $31,961,478.10, and the Central Pacific $41,771,344.20. This will be seen from a computation made by the learned, accurate, and able actuary of the Treasury Department, as follows:

Statement of process of computation of values, given in response to the letter of Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, member of Congress, bearing date May 29, 1876, addressed to Mr. Maclennan.

Assume, commencing in 1874, an annual payment of $450,000 as 5 per cent. of the net earnings and half services to be due to the Government from the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and a like amount from the Central Pacific Railroad Company, (meaning the Central Pacific and Western Pacific Companies;) required the amount that will be owing the Government at maturity of subsidy bonds (January 1, 1898) from each company, (1) for principal, (2,) for interest not re-imbursed, no allowance being made for interest on these several payments:

	Union Pacific.	Central Pacific.
Principal	$27,236,512 00	$27,855,680 00
Thirty years' interest at 6 per cent	49,025,721 60	50,140,224 00
Five per cent. of the net earnings and half services from 1874-1897, both inclusive, (twenty-four years,) assumed to be $450,000 a year	10,800,000 00	10,800,000 00
Therefore, at maturity due the Government for principal	27,236,512 00	27,855,680 00
For interest not re-imbursed	38,225,721 60	39,340,224 00

The amount of the proposed forty-four semi-annual payments by the Union Pacific Company of $375,000 each, the first payment to be made June 30, 1876, and the last or forty-fourth December 31, 1897, added to the amount of twenty-four semi-annual payments of $96,060 each, the first payment to be made June 30, 1886, and the last at the date of maturity of the bonds, December 31, 1897, compounded semi-annually, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, is $33,500,755.50.

In like manner the amount of the proposed forty-four semi-annual payments by the Central Pacific Company of $284,105 each, the first payment to be made June 30, 1876, and the last or forty-fourth December 31, 1897, added to the amount of twenty-four semi-annual payments of $96,060 each, the first payment to be made June 30, 1886, and the last at the date of maturity of the bonds, December 31, 1897, compounded semi-annually, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, is $25,424,559.80.

The proposed forty-four semi-annual payments of $375,000 each by the Union Pacific, and of $284,105 each by the Central Pacific, and the twenty-four proposed payments for the last portion of the period, of $125,000 each by the Union Pacific Company and of $96,060 each by the Central Pacific Company are the same in value as twenty payments of $375,000 each by Union Pacific Company and of $284,105 each by Central Pacific Company for the first part of the period of twenty-two years (or forty-four half years) and of twenty-four semi-annual payments of $560,000 each by the Union Pacific Company and of $380,165 each by the Central Pacific Company for the remaining twelve of the twenty-two years.

The balances due to the Government at maturity of subsidy bonds (January 1, 1898) are therefore as follows:

By the Union Pacific	$65,462,233 60
Less	33,500,755 50
Or	31,961,478 10
By the Central Pacific and Western Pacific Companies	67,195,904 00
Less	25,424,559 80
Or	41,771,344 20

E. B. ELLIOTT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., June 10, 1876.

Then on this estimate there will remain due to the United States on the 1st of January, 1898, from the Union Pacific, $31,961,478.10, and from the Central Pacific $41,771,344.20.

From that date, the Government will have a right to apply the "5 per cent. of net earnings" and "half services" and "the sinking fund payments" ALL annually to liquidate the accruing interest and principal of the subsidy bonds.

These annual payments will be upon the estimate made as follows:

In the case of the Union Pacific:

Estimated annual 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services	$450,000 00
Sinking fund required by bill	1,000,000 00
The annual interest on the debt of $31,961,478.10 is	1,917,688 69
Deficiency in sum required to pay annual interest	467,688 69

In the case of the Central Pacific:

Estimated annual 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services	450,000 00
Sinking fund required by bill	760,330 00
The annual interest on the debt of $41,771,344.20 is	2,506,280 65
Deficiency in sum required to pay annual interest	1,295,950 65

The learned actuary, to whom I have already referred in a letter of this date, very well says that on this plan:

The claim of the Government will never be extinguished.

We must look to future lower rates of interest and future legislation to remedy these deficiencies.

And yet these companies are not satisfied! The idea of complying with their obligations to the Government seems to be no part of their purpose! And they appeal to the Constitution in behalf of the obligation of contracts!

I will now endeavor to show that this measure is just, reasonable, necessary, and authorized.

THE BILL IS JUST.

I. It is just.

1. It simply requires the companies to provide the means of paying their just and admitted debts; not so soon as they may become due, but by a liberal indulgence in good part long after. The companies cannot pay their debts without providing the means. If they intend to do so, this bill does not interfere with their purpose, but carries it out in the safest possible method.

If they do not intend to do so, their purpose must be to disregard their promises and obligations. This would be dishonest, and demand at our hands the most vigorous measures to prevent so great a wrong, so enormous a fraud.

The obligation to pay is clear and undisputed. The fifth section of the act of 1862 declared, with reference to the subsidy bonds and interest, that—

To secure the repayment to the United States as hereinafter provided, of the amount of said bonds so issued, * * * with all interest thereon which shall have been paid by the United States, the issue of said bonds and delivery to the company shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of the railroad and telegraph, together with the rolling-stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description.

The act of 1864 changed this to a second mortgage, but it left in force the obligation to pay and that provision of the act of 1862 which declares that the grants of land and franchises are made "upon condition that said companies shall pay said bonds at maturity."

STOCKHOLDERS NO RIGHT TO COMPLAIN.

2. The stockholders will have no legal or moral ground of complaint. So far as there may be stockholders who have purchased shares for a valuable consideration, it might be a hardship if they could receive no dividends. But the Government does not guarantee dividends to stockholders. They take their chances with a full knowledge of their hazards.

This is so well understood as a principle of law and of morals that it said in all the books on private corporations that the claims of cred- itors are to be first satisfied before stockholders are entitled to dividends. The act of 1862, as I have shown, made it a "condition" of the existence of those companies and upon which property and privileges were granted to them that they "shall pay said bonds and interest."

This is the contract which binds the stockholders.

The payment of dividends without providing a sinking fund is a waste and misapplication of the revenues, which a court of equity would enjoin on behalf of private creditors of the companies sustaining to them the same relation which the Government does.

Story, in his Equity Jurisprudence, volume 1, § 730, says:

Where property is covenanted to be secured for certain purposes and in certain events, and there is danger of its being alienated or squandered, courts of equity will interpose to secure the property for original purposes. And, generally, * * * in cases of contracts, express or implied, courts of equity will interpose to preserve the funds devoted to particular objects under such contracts and decree what in effect is a specific performance, security to be given or the fund to be placed under the control of the court. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 165.)

The power of a court of equity to require a corporation to apply its funds to perform obligations to the public is well understood. (2 Redfield on Railways, § 211, page 359.)

WILL NOT IMPAIR VALUE OF STOCK.

The creation of the proposed sinking fund cannot impair the real value of the stock. If the purpose of stockholders is to make dividends until the maturity of the subsidy bonds, with no provision for their payment, and then let the roads be sold out and go into the hands of the first-mortgage bondholders, the stock sacrificed, and the Government defrauded out of the subsidy bonds and interest, this sinking fund would prevent all that. It would impair the value of the stock only as a means of accomplishing these purposes. But if the stockholders intend to pay their debts with a view to preserve a permanent value to the stock, they lose nothing by the sinking fund. Every dollar added to the fund is so much added to the permanent value of the stock. It is not a subtraction from, but an addition to, its value.

This bill is necessary to protect the stockholders or those who may become such.

If Congress shall permit these companies to make dividends, with no reservation for the payment of future debts, the stock will temporarily acquire a fictitious price far beyond its real value. This will enable stockholders who "understand the situation" at the proper ebb-tide in the market "to unload" upon unsuspecting buyers, and thus great wrong and ruin may be wrought.

The stockholders are in no condition to require that earnings should be paid out in dividends to the prejudice and in frand of the Government and other creditors. It is well understood that the directors of the principal companies own or control a majority of the stock—a combination of wealth and power in a few hands which should always have its just measure of protection, and against which I would scorn to create or invoke any prejudice, but which can well afford to permit the earnings of the companies to be set apart to pay the Government and other creditors.

The last annual report of these companies shows that in the Central Pacific there were only ninety-one individuals, firms, or companies owning its capital of $54,275,500; while the Union Pacific had three hundred and twenty-three stockholders owning its capital of $36,762,300.

THE RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE.

There are some other stockholders whose rights are to be respected. Every tax-payer in the United States is a stockholder in the Government, whose duty and interest it is to require the payment of these bonds and interest. By what authority can Congress surrender the rights of these tax-paying stockholders, whose claim rests on law and justice, in favor of incorporated stockholders, who have no right to such surrender either in law, justice, or morals? By what authority can we betray a people who have already surrendered so much? But as a matter of fact, as will be hereafter shown, the resources of the principal companies are ample to pay all charges, including the proposed sinking fund, and make reasonable dividends to stockholders besides.

THE FIRST-MORTGAGE BONDHOLDERS.

The first-mortgage bondholders have no legal or moral ground of complaint.

Their mortgages, by the express terms of section 10 of the act of 1864, "are authorized to be issued on the respective road, property, and equipments" of the several companies—on nothing more. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, pages 23, 76; Coe vs. Columbus Railroad, 10 Ohio State Rep. 372.)

Neither the franchise nor revenues are pledged to these bondholders.

On the contrary, they accepted a mortgage, with provisions in the law which gave the Government a right to appropriate the revenues in satisfaction of interest and principal of subsidy bonds before any claim could arise from this source either in favor of first-mortgage bondholders or stockholders.

This results from the sixth section of the act of 1862, by which the companies hold their lands, right of way, and some or all their franchises, "upon condition that the companies shall pay said bonds at maturity."

This is in the nature of a first mortgage or lien in favor of the Government on the revenues of the companies. It imposes a duty to pay, and the duty implies an obligation to provide the means, and the revenues are the only means otherwise unencumbered. A great author has said:

Whenever a power is given by a statute—

And where a duty is required, the result is the same quo ad hoc— everything necessary to the making of it effectual or requisite to attain the end is implied. "Quando lex aliquid concedit, concedere videtur et id, per quod devenitur ad illud." (1 Kent's Commentaries, page 464.)

This claim or lien in the nature of a first mortgage on the revenues to secure the Government may be made to exist by force of the express power reserved to Congress in the act of 1864, at any time to "alter, amend, or repeal it," as I will endeavor to show more fully hereafter.

The result, then, is—the contract is—that the first-mortgage bondholders have the first security "on the respective roads, property, and equipments," while the Government has control of all corporate franchises given by the acts of 1862 and 1864 and of all the revenues of the companies for its security. (House Report No. 440, page 23; 10 Ohio State, page 372.)

The power of repeal gives complete control over the franchise. The power to take it away, to create it anew and sell it, implies a power to control it, so as to direct the manner of applying the revenues. The major includes the inferior exercise of power.

No class of creditors are more interested in the creation of this sinking fund than the holders of first-mortgage bonds. The real danger they encounter is that the managers of the companies will divide out the earnings of the roads in dividends until the first mortgages mature, and then with a prospect of foreclosure and a sale of the roads for less than will pay the first-mortgage bonds, the bonds will depreciate in value, the managers of the roads will aid in depreciating them so they may buy in a sufficient amount to control the foreclosure, and then, with no competition, they will buy in the roads, so that bondholders may ultimately realize but a moiety of the money promised them in the mortgages.

But this is by no means material. The security of the first-mortgage bondholders is ample, if this proposed sinking fund shall be created, and thereby fidelity in the management of the roads secured.

THE RAILROAD COMPANIES ABLE TO CREATE SINKING FUNDS.

And, besides all this, the revenues of the principal companies are ample to provide the proposed sinking fund to pay interest on first-mortgage bonds and dividends in addition.

This I now proceed to show. The proposed sinking fund is designed to meet principal and interest of subsidy bonds, so that these may be omitted from the estimate.

The following statement will show approximately the capacity of the Union Pacific Company:

Union Pacific.	Amount.	Annual interest.
First-mortgage bonds	$27,232,000 00	$1,633,920

The capital stock paid, $36,762,300; 7 per cent. dividend on this is	2,573,361
Surplus	333,144

This 7 per cent. is over 11 per cent. dividend on the selling value of the stock at sixty cents on the dollar, and more than 22 per cent. on its actual cost to those who built the road and received the stock in payment. (Report No. 440, pages 16, 21, 149, 203, 287.)

Thus it will be seen this company can provide the requisite sinking fund and make a liberal dividend besides.

This estimate is based on the report made to the Secretary of the Interior by the company for the fiscal year 1875, giving net earnings $6,148,365. But the annual report of the directors to the stockholders, made March 8, 1876, for the year 1875 shows the surplus earnings $7,011,784. (House Report No. 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 226.) Here is an additional surplus of $863,419. This would increase the dividend 2¼ per cent. This estimate permits interest to be paid from net earnings on "sinking-fund mortgage-bonds." These bonds are a second mortgage on the land grant and a mortgage on the road subsequent to that of the Government. As against the Government mortgage they have no claim on the revenues of the road. They may well look to the land sales for payment. This would exclude from the computation $857,940 allowed to be deducted for interest before providing the proposed sinking fund. And now can this company continue to pay? The reports of the company made to the Secretary of the Interior show that notwithstanding the panic of September, 1873, and the depression in business since, the net earnings have gone on increasing at the rate of a million a year, as follows:

Year.	Receipts.	Expenditures.	Net earnings.
1867	$1,015,195 29	$658,880 54
1868	4,186,832 09	3,213,565 83
1869	7,342,271 16	5,894,268 63	$1,448,002 53
1870	8,344,371 08	5,649,573 45	2,694,797 63
1871	7,362,015 19
1872	7,962,170 78
1873	9,633,965 09	4,697,999 50
1875	11,522,021 54	5,373,655 87	6,148,365 67

The increase in surplus for 1875 is stated in the annual report to the stockholders at $1,303,607. At this rate of increase the dividend for next year could be increased 4 per cent. over the estimate for 1875, and this is to go on increasing.

The report to the stockholders for 1875 says:

The future of your property is no longer in doubt. The steady growth of its local trade; the continual and unexpected development of the zone of country through which the road runs, demonstrating that every part of it is valuable in agriculture and grazing-lands, ores, minerals, and hidden treasures that daily come to light, and that for over one thousand miles long east and west, and three hundred miles wide north and south, are tributary for all time to this one great artery. This will insure a steady, healthy, and rapid growth to the business of the road. Its coal, iron, silver, gold, soda, sulphur, paint, oil, lead, and copper products are daily increasing, and the Union and Central Pacific roads will soon carry east and west to markets a greater variety of products and precious metals than any road in the country.

Its coal traffic to-day in its infancy controls almost the entire fuel trade from the Missouri River to the Pacific coast, and as the manufactures, furnaces, mills, and other powers become necessary, the traffic in this one product cannot to-day be estimated.

The road has passed through the severest year in flood and snow that it has yet experienced, and has come out with comparatively small cost and no delay, and has demonstrated that its present improvements to meet both are ample and well conceived, and will avoid future great expenditure on this account.

The amicable arrangements and relations with connecting roads place us in a position to meet promptly unfriendly attacks, or competition, intended to obtain the traffic properly belonging to us, and will enable us to hold the great bulk of the travel and freight for the Pacific coast, and to China, Japan, and other important ports in the Pacific Ocean. Your board congratulates you upon the steady increasing value of the property, and predicts for the coming year an equally if not more remunerative one than the past. (House Report No. 440, page 228.)

It is somewhat remarkable that these companies in utter defiance of law refuse to show accurately what their net earning are.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in a communication to the Attorney-General, made January 15, 1875, says:

In this connection I desire to say that the twentieth section of the act of July 1, 1862, required these companies to make certain annual reports to the Secretary of the Treasury.

By the subsequent acts of June 28, 1868, these reports were to be made to the Secretary of the Interior. If the requirements of the law in this regard had been complied with, the annual net earnings of these companies would have been shown, and these would have furnished a basis upon which to make a demand for the 5 per cent. thereof.

The companies did not, however, comply with the requirements of the act, and did not, upon a further demand of the Interior Department, furnish a statement of the net earnings.

In this estimate for 1875 large amounts are included in operating expenses which, in fact, are permanent additions to the property and capital. The directors in their annual report to the stockholders for 1875 say:

The rate of expenses to earnings last year was considered as very small; this year it has been decreased from 45 97-100 to 41 54-100 per cent., a decrease of 4 43-100 per cent., and this is accomplished in the face of the extraordinary expenses incurred during the spring floods.

There has been expended for new construction during the year, $500,365.90. Included in this are twelve new locomotives, forty-one second-class passenger-cars, eighty-five new freight-cars, iron bridge for Dale Creek; new headquarters and depot at Omaha; eating-houses at Rawlins, Grand Island, Sidney, and other points, and permanent water-works at Omaha, Grand Island, and Dale Creek; also a large sum to complete the rolling-mill at Laramie, and the new scrap-furnace at Omaha.

Fifteen hundred and sixty-one tons of steel, and 7,422 tons of iron rails; 449,738 pine ties, and 55,594 hard-wood ties have been placed in the track. One hundred and eighty-two thousand five hundred and eighty-nine dollars and sixty-four cents has been expended in replacing wooden bridges with iron and steel, and repairing permanent structure, all of which has been charged to the operating expenses. The entire road-bed, together with equipment, depots, water-supply, and snow-defense, has been brought to a high order of efficiency, as demonstrated by the winter's experience. No such winter as this of 1875-'76 has been experienced since the road was finished. In the winter of 1871-'72, with less than half the snow of this winter, trains were delayed weeks; this winter we have combated the heavy drifting fall of snow and extraordinary cold weather successfully, with no unusual delay of trains or hinderance to travel.

The important work of filling and replacing all temporary structures was completed in 1874, but the company has added much to the efficiency of the road in past years by continuing the raising of banks and the widening of cuts, thus obviating the necessity of maintaining expensive snow sheds. The providing for extraordinary floods, and the general protection from damage by snow or water, will add important savings in the future operating expenses of the road.

These improvements, and the reduction in the cost of fuel, lead to the belief that for the next year, on the same volume of business, notwithstanding the extraordinary expenditure on account of the severe winter, even a further reduction of the percentage of operating expenses may be attained.

The new rolling-mill at Laramie has been completed, and has cost $212,503.33, and has a capacity to roll 20,000 tons per annum. It is now in full operation, turning out satisfactory work; and has rerolled for the company during the year 6,378 tons of iron, at the contract price of $18.50 per ton.

This is no unusual mode of adding to the value of the stock. The Government directors, in the report of September 13, 1872, referring to the obligation of the company to pay 5 per cent. of its net earnings to the Government, say:

Here it may be well to state, as illustrative of the company's ability to discharge this 5 per cent. claim, that up to August 1, 1872, the Union Pacific company had furnished toward the construction of the Colorado Central Railroad, in money and material, $369,244 94, besides $35,387 54 for equipment loaned; had advanced to the Utah Northern Railroad, in material, freight, &c., $91,000, and to the Utah Southern Railroad, in material, freight, &c., $99,109 52, or an aggregate of $494,742. We understand that the grand total for all of these roads now amounts to $1,400,000.

We do not question the wisdom of a policy which tends to secure to the trunk line the business which the said several roads may command. It could not well afford to have said business diverted from it. The policy, however, should be so ordered as not to interfere with whatever present or future claim the Government may have for re-imbursement.

We have herein expressed the opinion that the Union Pacific Railroad, properly managed, can be made to meet all just demands upon it, including the Government lien.

It is not an exceptionally expensive road to operate. With a careful, prudent management, located at the head of the road, clothed with necessary power, making itself thoroughly familiar with the character, resources, and needs of the country tributary, a most gratifying increase in the revenues of the company could, in our judgment, be effected. (Senate Executive Document No. 24, Forty-third Congress, first session, pages 4 and 5.)

In this estimate no account is taken of the land-grant bonds, which are set down in the report of the company to the Secretary of the Interior at $7,812,000.

The interest on these should not be deducted from the net earnings, because the lands will pay the interest and leave a source of revenue with which still further to augment the sinking fund.

The report of the directors to the stockholders for 1875 says:

The total amount of land sales for 1875 was 111,049.55 acres, purchased by seven hundred and five different persons, at an average price of $3.66 per acre, amounting to $404,462.

The total amount of land sold since organization of department was 1,082,893.36 acres, at an average price of $4.47 per acre, amounting to		$5,336,014 02
Amount of interest received on contracts		333,458 20
Amount received on forfeited contracts		1,140 94
Total proceeds		5,670,643 16
Total expenses of land department	$653,566 66
Total taxes paid	385,244 69
		1,038,811 35
Leaving net proceeds as		4,631,831 81
The total amount of land-grant bonds issued and sold by the company was		$10,400,000 00
Amount retired and canceled to date		2,768,000 00
Remaining outstanding		7,632,000 00

Leaving to be provided for by future sales		4,619,498 32

Thus showing that this portion of the bonded debt of the company will, in a short time, be entirely paid off and canceled, without encroaching upon the revenues of the road. A small part of the acreage left at present prices will create a fund sufficient to meet the balance of the land-grant bonds outstanding.

Here, then, it is shown that the resources of the company are more than ample to meet every demand on it, to make a reasonable dividend, and provide the proposed sinking fund besides.

The Central Pacific Company is equally able to pay, as will appear from the following statement:

Central Pacific.	Amount.	Annual interest.

How much larger than 6 per cent. on the real cost of the road may never be known. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, pages 21, 203, 287.)

On the basis of the earnings, expenses, and interest account for 1875, the Central Pacific company can make a dividend of 6 per cent. and have a surplus of $232,926.

This estimate is on the report of the company made to the Government. In that report the net earnings are stated for 1874 at $7,212,410, and for 1875, $8,031,498.

The report of the directors to the stockholders for the year ending December 31, 1874, is as follows:

	Coin.	Currency.
Earnings	$8,276,301 55	$5,334,720 08
Expenditures	5,223,429 42	44,702 45
	3,052,872 13	5,290,026 08
Total net earnings		8,342,898 76

The surplus already stated is therefore largely increased by premium on coin. The reports show also, as in the case of the Central Pacific company, a large addition to the value of the stock by expenditures in the nature of permanent additions of value, including Sacramento River steamers, $769,784.27, and a steady increase yearly of net earnings, indicating a prospective capacity to pay all demands and make increased dividends.

The vice-president of the Central Pacific company in his letter of May 15, says:

Heretofore, the company has preferred to use its surplus earnings in extending its branches and tributaries, in providing against winter obstructions along the exposed parts of its main line, and in otherwise perfecting its road, and consequently has divided but little among its stockholders.

This statement is made on the basis of the earnings of the five combined and consolidated companies, all merged in one controlling 1,219 miles of road. No separate report is made of the combined Central and Western Pacific, with their 860.66 miles of subsidy-aided roads, and it is understood that no separate account is kept, although as to the aided roads the Government is entitled to 5 per cent. of net annual earnings and half compensation for services to the United States, and as to the other roads there is no such claim. This shows how utterly this company has disregarded its obligation as to the net earnings and half services since the means of ascertaining them are placed beyond reach.

The Central Pacific company intimates that if the sinking fund be required it "might, wherever the stress of competition would permit, be forced to increase the rate of freight and fares, and thus enhance the cost of transportation to all who patronize the road, including the Government itself. (See Views of Minority, part 2 of House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session; letter of Vice-President Huntington, of May 15, 1876.)

Fortunately for passengers and shippers "the stress of competition" would probably not permit this.

But, if it would, the State of California can regulate "freights and fares" for commerce and passengers intended to be carried only within the State. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 265.)

The discussions in Congress during the last three years show that the authority of Congress is ample to regulate freights on all interstate commerce and fares for passengers; that is, on freights and passengers passing from one State to another or through the Territories, even as to companies incorporated either by Congress or by the States.

If the act of 1864 reserves to Congress an unqualified right to "alter or amend" the statutes in relation to these companies, then under this power there is ample romedy to regulate freights and fares. I will discuss the power to "alter or amend" in some respects before I close my remarks.

But if this power is not in this respect ample, there is a power under the eighteenth section of the act of 1862 whenever the net earnings of any company "shall exceed 10 per cent. upon" the "cost" of its road, to "reduce the rates of fare thereon." (House Report No. 440, page 51.)

Any attempt to "increase the rate of freight and fares" might bring the inquiry, what was "the cost" of the roads; the actual, honest cost. And if it should be shown, as a committee of this House has reported as to one of the roads, that it "cost" not more than the sum represented by its nominal capital stock, without reference to its bonded debt of $79,457,912, a duty would rest on Congress to largely reduce the present "rate of freights and fares." (House Report No. 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress, pages 16, 21, 149, 203, 287.)

This is an inquiry which it may not be well for these companies to require and the possibility of which should be remembered by stockholders; for if the stockholders are only entitled to 10 per cent. of dividends on the real, bona fide cost of the road, the stock may be found absolutely worthless.

The day is not far distant when roads will be made by companies at an economical cost and whose stockholders will be satisfied to realize fair dividends on such cost, and then the dividends of corporations whose stock is a fiction will vanish into nothingness.

I have now shown that this bill is just to all—unjust to none—unjust to none except the Government and people whose rights as fixed by law, as fixed by the assent of the companies, are not sufficiently provided for.

THE BILL IS REASONABLE.

It is so because it is just.

It is so because it demands only what the law sanctions.

It is so because it only requires the companies to abide by their contracts.

It is so because it demands even less than the companies are able to pay, and it indulges them far beyond the time when they agreed to pay.

It may be urged that the Government should guarantee a fixed rate of interest on the sinking fund. The bill requires it to be invested "to the best advantage in any bonds issued by the United States." Let the companies pay in the fund in the subsidy bonds and they will realize 6 per cent. compounded, whereas if they ever pay they only propose to pay 6 per cent., without any interest at all on advances.

IT IS NECESSARY.

This bill is necessary.

If the declarations and acts of these companies can be relied on as evidence there is an imperative necessity for prompt and decisive action to secure the just demands of the Government and to save it from loss.

The president of the Union Pacific company, in a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 9, 1875, says:

The mortgage held by the Government, in its terms and by judicial decision of the United States circuit court, cannot be enforced until the maturity of the bonds, which is near the close of the present century.

The bonds are accumulating an interest-account, also uncollectible until the principal is due. The principal and interest when due will amount to the very large aggregate of over $77,000,000, though the actual amount advanced by the Government was only $27,236,512.

For this very large amount the Government has only a second mortgage, and if it be allowed to accumulate, without any provision being made to meet it, the company will probably be utterly unable to pay it.

At the same time, it is equally manifest that the Government will be unable to collect it, except upon the assumption that it will advance the money to discharge prior mortgages, and run the road on Government account—a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise.

By standing still, therefore, the company has a load of debt accumulating for which no provision is made, and the Government is drifting further and further from the opportunity to secure a just return for its advances. To do nothing is to injure both the Government and the company, perhaps irretrievably to both. (And see House Executive Document No. 127, first session Forty-fourth Congress.)

Here, then, is the testimony of the president of this company, and I believe it.

The vice-president of the Central Pacific, in his letter of May 15 to the Judiciary Committee, says:

The security of the second lien of the Government, so far as the lands are concerned, is gradually disappearing.

He more than intimates that the Government should lose a portion of its claim, for, after referring to the general depreciation in values since the war, he says:

The company believe the question may properly be raised whether the nation is a co-investor in the great work, and, as the principal beneficiary, may not honorably share in this inevitable shrinkage.

And, referring to the subsidy-bond debt, he disclaims any purpose to create a sinking fund, and says:

The calculations in detail are somewhat lengthy and complicated, but may be condensed so as to show roughly the operation of the law as it now stands, contrasted with that of the proposed sinking fund, as follows:

The issue of bonds to the Central Pacific Railroad Company was	$25,885,120
And to the Western Pacific Railroad Company, to which the Central is successor	1,970,560
Or a total of subsidy bonds issued between 1865 and 1870	27,855,680
Thirty years' interest thereon, at 6 per cent., amounts to	50,140,224
Making a total of principal and interest	77,995,904
From this sum should be deducted repayments by one-half services from 1865 to December 31, 1875, amounting to about	1,000,000

If the existing plan were to continue in force till the bonds mature, and allowing the repayment by one-half of services and 5 per cent. of net earnings, as defined by the Supreme Court, (if it should be so adjudged,) to amount to a quarter of a million yearly for the remaining twenty-four years, there would remain to be paid a balance of about $70,000,000, or an average of $80,000 per mile for that portion of the main line on which the subsidy bonds were issued. These bonds and their interest are a second lien, subordinate to a first mortgage averaging $30,000 per mile.

Under these circumstances the company would have the alternatives presented of paying off this enormous sum in cash between 1895 and 1900, if they were able, or, if not, of then arranging with the Government for the creation of a sinking fund for its gradual liquidation during a series of years thereafter. In such an event, THE GOVERNMENT WOULD BE COMPELLED TO CHOOSE BETWEEN ENTERING INTO SUCH AN ARRANGEMENT with the company, OR RELINQUISHING ITS CLAIM ALTOGETHER, or assuming the payment of the interest and principal of the first-mortgage bonds and taking possession of the road. There can be no question that, as between these three alternatives, the first would be the only one which the Government could afford to entertain, or to which it could look for the ultimate recovery of its advances.

But can this whole subject be safely left to the judgment and discretion of the companies? Most certainly not.

They do not propose the creation of any sinking fund under their own control.

They resist the creation of any under the management of the Government.

If the conduct of those who have heretofore managed these companies has failed to inspire confidence that the interests of the Government will be fairly protected, the fault is theirs, not ours.

In a report made by a committee of this House on the 20th February, 1873, it was said of the Union Pacific Company:

That the moneys borrowed by the corporation, under a power given them only to meet the necessities of the construction and endowment of the road, have been distributed in dividends among the corporators; that the stock was issued not to men who paid for it at par in money, but who paid for it at not more than 30 cents on the dollar in road-making; that, of the Government directors, some of them have neglected their duties, and others have been interested in the transactions by which the provisions of the organic law have been evaded; that at least one of the commissioners appointed by the President has been directly bribed to betray his trust by the gift of $25,000; that the chief engineer of the road was largely interested in the contracts for its construction; and that there has been an attempt to prevent the exercise of the reserved power in Congress by inducing influential members of Congress to become interested in the profits of the transaction. So that of the safeguards above enumerated none seems to be left but the sense of public duty of the corporators. (Report 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 140.)

This latter sentence is cogent for the depth of its irony and the force of its sarcasm.

I have now shown that the creation of a sinking fund under the control of the Government IS A NECESSITY.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO CREATE THE SINKING FUND.

The creation of this sinking fund in the mode proposed is AUTHORIZED by the EXPRESS AGREEMENT of the companies.

This question has already been argued somewhat at large in the report from the Judiciary Committee. (Report No. 440, April 25, 1876; 2 Southern Law Review, new series, April, 1876, page 22; 8 Boston American Law Review, 1873–'74, page 190; 9 Law Review, 1874–'75, pages, 50, 213.)

I will briefly restate some of the facts, positions, and authorities there relied on.

By the act of 1862, the United States held a first-mortgage lien on the railroads to secure the repayment of the subsidy bonds and interest. This made the Government perfectly secure. That act reserved to Congress a very limited and qualified right to amend the act and so change the contract which it created between the companies and the Government. (Section 18.)

The act of 1864 doubled the land grants to these companies, authorized them to mortgage their roads for bonds to an amount equal to the subsidy bonds, made the Government mortgage a second lien instead of a first, surrendered the right of the Government to apply all of the services rendered to it by the companies as a credit on advances of interest, and in lieu provided that only half should be so applied, and gave the companies additional and valuable powers and privileges.

In return for all this it was expressly stipulated:

That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

In other words, the act of 1862 created a contract between the companies and the Government, prescribed its terms, the time when the companies should pay money, the security the Government should then have, and in effect said to the companies, "The Government cannot change these terms, can exact no other security, impose no additional duties."

That was the contract of 1862. But the act of 1864 made a new contract. The United States surrendered their best security, agreed that a prior mortgage should be placed on the roads, gave an immense additional land grant, and the companies, in consideration of these, in accepting the new law—the new contract—said to Congress, in the last section of the act:

You may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this contract. You may change its terms.

It was under this law that the subsidy bonds were issued and the lands granted. This means something; it must have some purpose. It means, among other things, that if Congress finds the second-mortgage security inadequate, or the companies making no provision to pay the subsidy bonds, they may be required to so apply their earnings as to make the payment certain. An obligation may be imposed on them to this extent, a change in the contract, because the companies so agreed. A sinking fund may be required in the form prescribed in this bill. If this cannot be done, what can? If the authority to require this is not reserved to Congress by the right to alter the contract, what power can be exercised? In the report which has been submitted on this subject no less than sixteen different decisions of courts are quoted more or less at large, and a still greater number are referred to, all affirming this power of Congress.

And now I will ask attention only to a few of these:

Miller vs. State, 15 Wallace, 478:

A railroad company was organized under a law authorizing its creation, with thirteen directors to be elected by stockholders. A subsequent statute gave the city of Rochester, which had become a stockholder, power to appoint seven of the directors, leaving the other stockholders to elect six. The court held this was an authorized exercise of power under a reservation in the law of a right to alter or repeal.

Judge Clifford said of such charter:

The reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant, or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of stockholders and creditors and for the proper disposition of the assets. (Fitchburgh Railroad Company vs. Grand Junction Railroad Company, 4 Allen, Massachusetts, 198; Bangor Old Town Railroad Company vs. Smith, 47 Maine, 34; State vs. Cape Girardeau Railroad Company, 48 Missouri, 468; Tabuskie vs. Hackensack and New York Railroad Company, 3 C. E. Green, Chancery, New York, 178.)

This is a clear statement of the broad power which may be exercised by Congress. Let us apply it here: "The original purpose of the grant" to these companies was to secure the repayment to the Government of the subsidy bonds at their maturity. Mr. Justice Clifford says that for this purpose the "reserved power" to alter the contract "may be exercised and to almost any extent."

The Government is a creditor of the companies. Mr. Justice Clifford says that "to protect the rights of creditors" this "reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent." But how shall creditors be protected? Mr. Justice Clifford answers: "The reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, FOR THE PROPER DISPOSITION OF THE ASSETS."

This is well and truly said, for there is no mode of securing creditors but by the proper disposition of the assets, and the creation of a liability as a mode of reaching them "necessary and proper" to secure the object.

In Pomeroy's note to Sedgwick on Statutes (second edition, page 620) it is said of the reserved power to alter that—

It certainly is far broader than the police power, the taxing power, or the power of eminent domain. * * * There are cases which hold that the power of repeal and amendment enables the Legislature to dispose of the property of all corporations to the same extent as it may dispose of the property of municipal corporations, and to invalidate contracts so far as the corporations are concerned. * * * It has been held that the limits of an exclusive ferry privilege may be narrowed. (Perrin vs. Oliver, 1 Minnesota, page 202.) And in New York that the land of a railroad may be taken for a public highway without compensation. (Boston, &c., Railroad vs. Greenbush, 5 Lansing, page 461.)

This bill asks no such exercise of power as this would seem to warrant.

Hyatt vs. McMahon, 25 Barbour, 467:

A mutual insurance company was organized under a statute which authorized the directors to make assessments on premium notes to meet losses, but which reserved the legislative power to alter or repeal the charter. A subsequent law authorized receivers to make assessments. The plaintiff, as receiver, sued to recover an assessment. Rosekrans, judge, said:

The Legislature, when they granted this charter, reserved the right to alter it. * * * The Legislature exercised this right by declaring that when the assets of such corporation passed into the hands of a receiver, he should make the assessment instead of the directors. This was a legitimate exercise of the reserved power. * * * Even if it increased the liability of the members, as it does not, it would be valid. (10 Barbour, 2, 60.) It need not be claimed to be without limit, or that it may be capriciously or wantonly exercised, but it may be affirmed that it may be exercised, in all cases and to any extent, to carry out the original purposes of the incorporation, and to secure the due administration of justice in regard to the rights of creditors of the corporation, and the proper disposition of its assets. (Northern Railroad Company vs. Miller, 10 Barbour, 282; Schenectady Plank Road Company vs. Thatcher, 1 Kernan, 102-115; White vs. Syracuse Railroad, 14 Barbour, 560; Troy Railroad vs. Kerr, 17 Barbour.)

In Kenosha Railroad vs. Marsh, 17 Wisconsin, 13, the court said of the reserved power to alter:

Undoubtedly the Legislature might, under this power, impose new duties and new restraints upon corporations in the prosecution of the enterprises already undertaken.

Hyatt vs. McMahon, 25 Barbour, 467:

A charter was altered by the Legislature, and the court said of the alteration:

Even if it increased the liability of the members, as it does not, it would be valid.

Northern Railroad Company vs. Miller, 10 Barbour, 282:

This was an action to recover on a stock subscription under a charter which reserved a legislative right to alter or repeal. The defense was that the Legislature had altered the charter by authorizing the corporation to borrow money and to construct branch lines of railroad.

The court said:

The directors * * * by accepting the charter became bound by this condition or reservation; and every individual who subscribes to the stock of the company thereby makes himself a party to the contract, subject to the conditions and reservations of the charter. In effect, he stipulates at the time he subscribes that the Legislature may alter or repeal the law, and thus change the obligation of his subscription, or defeat it altogether. * * * Whatever modification is thus effected in the obligation created by his subscription, is made by his own agreement. * * * What a man authorizes another to do is as obligatory upon him when done as if it had been performed by himself.

The bill now before the House does not go so far as bills introduced in the Senate from the head of the Railroad Committee, and which I may be permitted to read by way of authority, as follows:

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

S. 275.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 17, 1876.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in the following bill; which was read twice, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of section 5 of the act of which this is amendatory as provides that only one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government by said companies shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of the construction of said roads be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act all compensation for services rendered for the Government of the United States by the Pacific railroad companies shall be applied to the payment of the bonds issued to, and the interest paid, and to be paid, for said companies until the whole amount is fully re-imbursed to the United States.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

S. 316.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 20, 1876.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in the following bill; which was read twice, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1-64.

Whereas under and by virtue of an act of the Congress of the United States, approved the 2d day of July, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," the Government, in addition to its munificent land grant of —— acres, loaned to the Pacific railway companies mentioned in said act and the subsequent acts amendatory thereof, the aggregate sum of $64,623,512 in 6 per cent. bonds at thirty years, bearing interest payable semi-annually, to secure the payment of which a lien was retained upon the property and franchises of the several companies for the respective amounts loaned; and whereas, by subsequent amendments to said acts, the said companies were permitted to issue their first-mortgage bonds on their respective roads in amounts not to exceed the amount of bonds loaned to them by the United States Government, which bonds should be a lien upon said road superior to the lien of the United States; and whereas the said companies refuse to re-imburse the United States Treasury for interest already paid on said bonds, amounting now to over $20,000,000, and decline to pay any interest until the maturity of the bonds, while some of said companies are declaring dividends to stockholders; and whereas the interest on the bonds loaned to these companies will amount, at their maturity, including compound interest on the coupons, as paid by the Government until that date, to over $300,000,000; and whereas the official report of the Secretary of the Interior to the President of the United States exhibits the net earnings of said companies for the year ending June 30, 1875, as exceeding $15,000,000, being nearly 12 per cent. of the first-mortgage-bond debt, which has precedence of lien over the bonds loaned these companies by the Government and the Government debt combined, showing unquestioned ability, from earnings, to pay the accruing interest to the Government; and whereas it was not the purpose of the Government, in promoting and fostering these great national enterprises, to postpone its own lien to the enriching of individual shareholders: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of sections 5 and 6 of the act of Congress approved the 2d day of July, 1862, and of which this is amendatory, as provides, either by their express terms or by their construction, that the railroad companies therein named shall not be required to pay interest on the United States bonds loaned to them by the terms of said act until the maturity of the bonds, or to re-imburse the Government for interest paid and to be paid by the Government on said bonds until the maturity of the bonds, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act said companies shall be liable to pay into the Treasury of the United States the whole amount of interest heretofore paid by the Government on the bonds loaned to said companies in aid of the construction of said railroads, together with interest upon the several sums paid by the Government in discharge of interest on said bonds, at the rate of — per cent. per annum from the date of payment, less the amount retained by the Government for the transportation of the mails from time to time, which shall be credited in the account every six months; and it shall be the duty of said companies respectively to deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, ten days immediately preceding the maturity of semi-annual interest on the bonds respectively loaned them, such sums added to the amount then due each company from the United States on account of the mail service and use of telegraph lines as will amount to the semi-annual interest then falling due.

(And see House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, pages 280, 293, for an able argument in support of these bills.)

VESTED RIGHTS.

These railroad companies affirm that they have vested rights, and, as it has been said by an able writer—

This term of vested rights is now sought to be made as effectual as the phrase chartered rights of men was in 1783 when the East India Company appealed to Magna Charta in support of the right to oppress and plunder thirty millions of Asiatics without parliamentary interference.

But it was well said by Mr. Burke, in the Commons of England at that time, that—

For us passively to bear with oppressions committed under the sanction of our own authority is in truth and reason for this house to be an active accomplice in the abuse.

That these companies have vested rights no lawyer, no man will deny. I yield to no man in respect for vested rights. No vested right shall ever be infringed with any sanction of mine. But what are vested rights?

When a title to land or goods or choses in action or a right of action is vested in a corporation or other person this right cannot be taken away by an act of Congress.

Chief Justice Shaw, in Commonwealth of Massachusetts vs. Essex Company, (13 Gray, 253,) comments upon the reserved power to alter a charter as follows:

It seems to us that this power must have some limit, though it is difficult to define it. Suppose an authority has been given by law to a railroad corporation to purchase a lot of land for purposes connected with its business, and they purchased said lot from a third party, could the Legislature prohibit the company from holding it? If so, in whom should it vest; or could the Legislature direct it to revest in the grantor, or escheat to the public, or how otherwise? Suppose a manufacturing company, incorporated, is authorized to erect a dam and flow a tract of meadow, and the owners claim gross damages, which are assessed and paid, can the Legislature afterward alter the act of incorporation so as to give to such meadow-owners future annual damages? Perhaps, from these extreme cases—for extreme cases are allowable to test a legal principle—the rule to be extracted is this: That when, under power in a charter, rights have been acquired and become vested, no amendment or alteration of the charter can take away the property or rights which have become vested under a legitimate exercise of the powers granted.

Here the learned judge would seem to concede to Congress the power to make any law unless it divested a title. I am unwilling to go so far as this.

But the claim now made for the companies is that they have a vested right to contract debts, and then a vested right to refuse to make any provision for their payment.

To a plain, unsophisticated man, this would look like a vested right to swindle creditors, and a demand that such right should be protected by Congress and the courts.

If any such rights have been heretofore protected, a continuance of this practice "will be more honored in the breach than the observance."

The bill now before the House divests no title, impairs no right. It recognizes the right of the Government as a creditor, and only provides a remedy to secure it. It deals with an acknowledged right only to the extent of prescribing a remedy to secure it.

THE POWER TO ALTER.

It has been insisted that this power to "alter or amend" is only a qualified power. (Senate Report No. 341, Forty-fourth Congress first session; minority views in House Report No. 440.)

The act of 1862 provides as follows:

SEC. 18. That whenever it appears that the net earnings of the entire road and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered for the United States, after deducting all expenditures, including repairs, and the furnishing, running, and managing of said road, shall exceed 10 per cent. upon its cost, exclusive of the 5 per cent. to be paid to the United States, Congress may reduce the rates of fare thereon, if unreasonable in amount, and may fix and establish the same by law. And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The last section of the act of July 2, 1864, is as follows:

SEC. 22 That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

These two acts are to be construed together as one act. (Kansas Pacific Company vs. Prescott, 16 Wallace, page 603.)

The section 18 of the act of 1862 does not limit and control section 22 of the act of 1864, but the latter statute must modify and control the former one. If it does so where the interests of the companies are concerned, it must do so where the interests of the United States are concerned. This is the necessary result of the case in 16 Wallace, 603. This must be so, because the language of the act of 1864 so requires.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I move that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and his time is extended.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It must be so, because the rule of strict construction applied to corporations so requires. (L. L. and G. R. R. Co. vs. United States, 1 Otto.)

It must be so, because it is the manifest purpose of the act, tested by its language and the rule of construction to which I have referred, and still further as a necessity growing out of the great surrender of property and privileges made to the companies by the act of 1864.

It is said, in the views of the minority of the Judiciary Committee, that this bill "impairs the obligation of the original contract."

This is a mistake. It seeks to preserve and enforce the obligation by which the companies agreed to pay the subsidy bonds and interest at maturity.

The right to prescribe a mode by which this obligation is enforced is given to Congress in the reserved power to "alter, amend, or repeal" the original contract.

The bonds were issued under and after the act of 1864; and I will repeat, as to these companies and this bill, what the court said in Northern Railroad Company vs. Miller, 10 Barbour, 282.

Whatever modification is thus effected [by this bill] in the [original] obligation is made by [their] own agreement. What a man authorizes another to do is as obligatory upon him when done as if it had been performed by himself.

The contracts under the Post-Office Department for carrying the mails reserve a right to the Postmaster-General practically to alter, amend, or repeal. The Postmaster-General exercises that right, and requires a less or greater number of trips, and various other changes in the mode of performing the contract, but no contractor yet has appealed to the Constitution as a protection against a change to which he had assented. Yet that is precisely the condition of these companies now.

NO CHANGE OF THE TIME OF PAYING THE DEBT.

It is alleged that the obligation of the contract is impaired "by changing the time of the payment of the debt." It is not necessary to inquire if such a change could be made. The bill does not change "the time of payment." It requires a fund to be paid in to be invested on interest until the maturity of the subsidy bonds, and then when the debt is conceded to be due it is to be paid—not before that.

The companies propose to violate the obligation of their contract by refusing to make any provision for its payment when due.

It is said this bill "necessarily affects the vested rights (1) of the company itself, (2) of the stockholders, and (3) of the holders of the first-mortgage bonds."

It would be a sufficient answer to this to say that under the power reserved to Congress to "alter, amend, or repeal" the contract the companies agreed that Congress might so far change their duties as to require them to create this sinking fund.

There is no vested right of any company interfered with unless it has a vested right to swindle its creditors.

NO RIGHT OF STOCKHOLDERS INFRINGED.

No vested right of the stockholders is interfered with, because by law they have no right to dividends until the claims of creditors are provided for.

Why is their right to dividends more sacred than the right of the Government to payment of its debt? If the application of the revenues of the company to the payment of the debt of the Government affects the vested rights of stockholders and first-mortgage bondholders, why would not such an application to them affect the vested rights of the Government?

The stockholders have no mortgage, no lien, no lawful right to divert revenues from the payment of general creditors. The Government has a mortgage, has a lien, has by express consent of the companies power to control the application of the revenues and the power to prescribe a duty, as the courts say, "so as to protect the rights of creditors." (15 Wallace, 478.)

FIRST-MORTGAGE BONDHOLDERS.

It may be said that if this sinking fund is enforced the companies cannot pay or create a sinking fund to pay the first-mortgage bonds at maturity. To this there are several answers.

The companies have not proposed to create any such fund.

Why should such fund be created for the first-mortgage bonds rather than the debt to the Government?

They are secure, the Government is not. A foreclosure will give them all the security they asked or bargained for. They can by law claim no more. To ask or to take more is to interfere with and affect vested rights of the Government. Congress can by law require additional security for the repayment of the subsidy bonds. But if the companies would propose to create a sinking fund, under Government control, for the payment of the first-mortgage bonds, we might perhaps afford to agree to it. That would secure the Government by leaving its mortgage with no prior incumbrance.

Let the companies present their bill and it will deserve consideration. If the subsidy bonds shall be provided for by a sinking fund, these companies may, by a new loan, secure further time for the payment of their first mortgage bonds.

DANGER OF LOSS TO THE GOVERNMENT BY FORECLOSURE.

But with no sinking fund for either, an immense debt will mature about the year 1898, a foreclosure of the first-mortgage bonds will take place, the road will be bought in on these, and the Government will lose its entire debt.

It will not be difficult to foresee who the purchasers will be. The men who manage the roads will own the first-mortgage bonds and become the purchasers.

THE RAILROAD COMPANIES CAN PERFORM EVERY DUTY.

It may be said this sinking fund may disable the companies from maintaining their roads, a failure to do which will forfeit the charter granted by Congress, (part 2, views of minority, Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 12; Senate Report No. 341, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 6.) But they have the capacity to maintain their roads and pay this sinking fund besides. No man doubts this.

Both the acts of 1862 and 1864 show that the railroad companies agreed to "keep the railroads and telegraph lines in repair and use, and at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph lines and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroads for the Government."

If the mortgage debts of the companies are permitted to accumulate, with no provision for their payment, the roads must eventually be sold out and pass into other hands.

These sinking funds are necessary to keep the companies in a condition, as said by the supreme court of New York, "to carry out the original purposes of the incorporation." Unless the sinking funds are created, the roads will not be permanently kept in repair by the existing companies.

And if the companies must fail, it is no worse in point of legal duty to fail to keep their roads in repair than to fail to pay their debts.

If they cannot perform all duties, it may be because one of them, if not more, has squandered the money and property bestowed as a gift in illegal distributions among those who managed the roads. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, pages 21, 149, 287.)

I repeat, the companies can keep their roads in repair and create the sinking funds besides.

Let them offer to pay into the Treasury, for a sinking fund, all their net earnings, after keeping the roads in repair, paying the interest on first-mortgage bonds, and paying the required 5 per cent. of net earnings and "half services," and Congress would give a speedy consideration to such proposition. No vested right of the "holders of the first-mortgage bonds" is interfered with, because they have no pledge of the revenues of any company, the Government has. If the bill creates a debt, which may be reduced to judgment and become a lien by levy or otherwise on the road, it will be subject to the prior lien of the first mortgage, which is not interfered with, impaired, or divested in the slightest degree.

STATE CORPORATIONS.

If it be urged that the Central Pacific Company is a State corporation and that Congress cannot alter its act of incorporation the answer is very plain.

By the acts of 1862 and 1864 that corporation made a contract with the Government and agreed that Congress might at any time "alter or amend" it. Under this power Congress may now legislate, as said by Mr. Justice Clifford, in any manner "necessary to secure the due administration of the affairs" of these companies and protect the Government as a creditor, and thus carry into effect the original object to secure payment of the subsidy-bond debt.

But the Central Pacific company obtained under those acts its entire franchise in many respects and, as to its road east of California, all its franchises.

DUTY IN CASE OF DOUBT.

And now let me address a few words to those who doubt the power of Congress over this subject. No lawyer will say that there is no reasonable ground to maintain the right to create a sinking fund. If there could be doubt, why resolve it now against the Government and people? Have they no rights which Congress is bound to respect? Is every doubt to be resolved against them here in their own Hall, where they are supposed to be represented?

If the doubt be resolved against them here, they are without any remedy. They cannot appeal to the courts to supply the omission of Congress. But if we should err in enacting a law, err in what we may do, the railroad companies have a remedy. They can appeal to the courts to protect them against the mistake. Let this whole question be put in a shape where the Government and people can have a trial of this question. Let not their rights be trampled under foot and they denied all opportunity to avert the daring robbery which is threatened against them. Who stands here to say the proposed measure is wrong in any respect? Who stands here to say these companies are to be justified in refusing to make any provision for the payment of their debts?

THE THREAT OF LITIGATION.

The threat is held over our heads that if this bill be passed the companies will resist its enforcement in the courts.

I believe they will execute this promise much better than their promise to pay their debts. If the courts shall still further aid them—which I do not for one moment believe—by declaring them above all law, and by holding that repudiation is their vested right, the Government even then will be in no worse condition than it is now without the passage of this bill. We have everything to gain and nothing to lose by the bill. And if at last the solemn seal of judicial sanction shall be given—which, for the honor of our courts, I cannot believe—to perfidy and repudiation, when we thus learn that no obligation of law, honor, or morals binds the companies or can be enforced in courts, Congress will at least be in a position then to inquire whether protection to the Government and people may not demand a repeal of corporate franchises which are so grossly abused.

THE PROPOSITIONS OF THE RAILROAD COMPANIES.

I now propose to consider briefly certain propositions submitted by the principal companies. They deny the right or power of Congress to enforce payment of an acknowledged indebtedness, and demand a new surrender of many millions from the Government.

NEW SACRIFICES DEMANDED.

The Union Pacific company a year ago proposed in substance to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay into the Treasury as a sinking fund "$500,000 per annum in semi-annual installments of $250,000" for ten years and double that sum thereafter, all to be put on compound interest at 6 per cent. per annum until the maturity of the subsidy bonds, but it is required that these payments shall "be in full settlement of all claims by the Government." (House Report No. 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress, pages 94, 95.)

Under the law as it now stands the "5 per cent of net earnings" and "half services" rendered the Government apply each year as a credit on the Government advances or payments of interest on subsidy bonds. In this mode the Government is now entitled to be re-imbursed each year for its advances of interest so far as the application of 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services may extend in re-imbursement. I have already shown that the Government is entitled to receive annually for "5 per cent. of net earnings" and "half services" a larger sum at least for the first ten years than the payments for sinking fund offered by this company. The proposition of the company, then, is in effect to put on compound interest for its benefit until the maturity of the subsidy bonds, about twenty-two years, $500,000 each year during that time, when by law now the Government is entitled to this sum or more without allowing any interest at all!

It requires but little computation to show the loss to the Government, the gain to this company, by this operation. This company graciously proposes to accept a new sacrifice by the Government which shall add new and increased taxes on the people for its benefit.

The proposition covers an offer that any money now due the company for half services shall go into this so-called sinking fund. But this assumes that there is money due, which depends upon the result of pending suits to determine what amount is due the Government for 5 per cent. of net earnings. (Senate Report No. 341, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 3.)

And it is coupled with the proposition for compound interest in the face of the law which says it shall be credited on advances by the Government without any interest.

The proposition of the Central Pacific company is substantially the same in effect, with an offer to pay $200,000 semi-annually. (House Report No. 480, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 96.)

Both are alike unreasonable and unjust.

These are the offers made by these companies in 1875. Since that time it is understood the companies have proposed new terms. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 36, note, page 38, note, page 103; same report, part 2, views of minority, pages 10, 15; Senate Report No. 341, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, accompanied with Senate bills No. 687 and 870.)

THE OFFER OF WORTHLESS LANDS.

By these the Union Pacific company proposes to release to the United States its lands west of the one hundredth meridian of longitude in the State of Nebraska and the Territories of Wyoming and Utah to the amount of 600,000,000 of acres for $15,000,000, to be credited on the principal of the subsidy bonds, with a sinking fund payment semi-annually of $375,000.

In order that I may present the proposition which I suppose to be acceptable to the company, I ask the Clerk to read a bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

S. 870.—(Report No. 341.)

May 26, 1876.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Railroads, submitted a report, (No. 341,) accompanied by the following bill; which was read the first and second times:

A bill to create a sinking fund for the liquidation of the Government bonds advanced to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and for the settlement of the claim of the Government on account of said bonds.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Union Pacific Railroad Company may, and it is hereby authorized to, convey and release to the United States all the lands on the main line of its railroad westerly of the one hundredth meridian of longitude, in the State of Nebraska and in the Territories of Wyoming and Utah, which were granted by the acts of Congress of July 1, 1862, and of July 2, 1864, to said Union Pacific Railroad Company, to the amount of six million acres, for the consideration of $15,000,000, computed at the price established for even-numbered sections of Government lands within the limits of railroad grants.

SEC. 2. That upon a conveyance and release of said lands being executed in due form, and delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, he is hereby authorized and directed to receive the said conveyance and release from the said Union Pacific Railroad Company, and to credit and apply the sum of $15,000,000, the value or price of the lands so conveyed and released, to the extinguishment of that amount of the claim of the Government for the principal of the Government bonds advanced under said acts to said Union Pacific Railroad Company; said credit and application to be, however, conditioned upon the performance, by said company, of the provisions of this act relative to the payments by said company to be made on account of its land-grant and sinking-fund mortgages.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is also hereby authorized and directed to carry to the credit of a sinking fund, for the payment of the balance of the principal of said bonds and of the interest, the amount due the said company for the carriage and transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores for the Government, under the act aforesaid, up to the 31st day of December, 1875, payment of which has been withheld under the act of March 3, 1873, which, if not amounting to the sum of $1,000,000, shall be made up by the company to that sum; any sum exceeding said $1,000,000 to be forthwith paid to said company.

SEC. 4. That the said company shall pay semi-annually, on the 1st day of April and October in each year, into the Treasury of the United States, such approximate sum, not exceeding $375,000, either in lawful money or in any of the bonds and securities of the United States Government at par, as shall, with interest thereon as hereinafter provided, be sufficient, when added to the other sums to the credit of said sinking fund, to pay off and extinguish the balance of the claim for the Government bonds advanced as aforesaid, with 6 per cent. interest thereon from their respective dates up to the maturity of the last bonds issued to said company. Interest on all sums placed to the credit of said sinking fund shall be credited and added thereto semi-annually at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

SEC. 5. That the payments so to be made by said company shall be in lieu of all payments or other requirements from said company under said act and the amendments thereto in relation to the re-imbursement to the Government of the bonds so issued to said corporation: Provided, however, That until said bonds and interest are fully paid, said company shall not in any manner be released from its present liabilities to keep the said railroad and telegraph lines, constructed under the acts of Congress aforesaid, in repair and use, and to transmit dispatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the Government whenever required to do so by any Department thereof, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, the whole amount of which shall, upon the compliance of the company with the provisions hereof, be paid by the Government to said company, on the adjustment of the accounts therefor, and that the Government shall, at all times, have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid; said rates not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of said Union Pacific Railroad Company to provide for and pay the interest on all land-grant bonds issued under the mortgage of April 6, 1867, payable twenty years from said date, and on all bonds issued under the sinking-fund mortgage of December 18, 1873, payable September 1, 1893, which mortgages cover the lands to be released and conveyed to the Government according to the provisions of this act; and said company shall also provide and maintain any necessary sinking funds for the redemption of all such land-grant and sinking-fund bonds, and shall duly redeem or pay all such bonds at or before the maturity thereof, or shall otherwise discharge said lands from the lien of said mortgages; and whenever and as often as any of the aforesaid lands shall be sold by the Government to settlers or otherwise, said company shall pay to the trustees under said land-grant mortgage, or to the trustees under said sinking-fund mortgage, as the case may require, an amount sufficient to release and discharge such lands so sold by the Government from all claim under said mortgages against said lands.

SEC. 7. That the mortgage of the Government created by the fifth section of the act of July 1, 1862, amended by the act of July 2, 1864, shall not be in any way impaired or released by the operations of this act unless or until the obligations of said company to the Government under said section 5 are, in accordance with the provisions of this act or otherwise, fully and perfectly performed; but said mortgage shall remain in full force and virtue, and, upon the failure of said company to perform the obligations imposed upon it by this act, said mortgage shall be enforced as if this act had not been passed; the Government, however, duly crediting and allowing to said company upon said mortgage all payments which may have been made in part execution of this act.

SEC. 8. That said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall be entitled at any time, whenever its financial condition will allow, to pay to the Government, in lieu of the semi-annual payments provided for in section 4 of this act, which may then remain to be made before the full payment and extinguishment of the balance of the Government claim as aforesaid, the then present value of all such future semi-annual payments, computed according to an interest rate of 6 per cent. per annum; and upon such payment of the present value the said balance of the Government claim shall be discharged without further semi-annual payments.

SEC. 9. That this act shall not be operative unless the same shall be accepted by the said Union Pacific Railroad Company within four months from the date of its passage by votes of the directors and stockholders at regular meetings duly called.

SEC. 10. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The principal companies, on the 9th of June, submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the House a substantially similar proposition, in the form of a bill, not including a release of lands to the United States, substantially as proposed in the letter of the vice-president of the Central Pacific company of May 15 to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I proceed, therefore, to state some of the objections to these schemes urged by the companies.

THE OBJECT TO ESCAPE TAXES.

1. One object, as avowed by these companies, is to escape taxation in the State of Nebraska and the Territories of Wyoming and Utah. (Part 2 of House Report No. 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress; views of minority, page 14.)

The hardy and enterprising pioneers, many of whom have paid for their lands, bear the burdens of taxation, but these companies having obtained lands as a gift while sharing the benefit of State and territorial government, propose to throw the whole burden of taxation on the very people who in good part contribute the freight and passengers to make a large portion of their revenues. This House has already determined that this would not be just by passing at this session a bill authorizing the taxation of the railroad lands whether patented or not.

THE PURPOSE TO PREVENT PRE-EMPTION OF LANDS.

2. If the Government should take these lands at $2.50 an acre it must sell at that price, with interest added until the time of sale, or suffer loss.

By law these lands are now, or soon will be, subject to pre-emption in favor of actual settlers at half this price.

The original land grant was made by the third section of the act of 1862, which provides that—

All such lands, so granted by this section, which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other lands, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, to be paid to said company.

According to the claim of the Government the Union Pacific road was completed more than three years ago, and these lands are now open to settlement at $1.25 an acre.

This company claims that its road was not completed until October, 1874; but even this would soon make these lands subject to pre-emption, as I have stated. (House Report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, pages 10–17.)

This proposition, then, is a mere scheme to deprive actual settlers of the right to take these lands at $1.25 an acre, so far as there are any lands suitable for settlement. It is a mere scheme to enable the companies to obtain an increased price for their lands.

GOOD LANDS RESERVED TO COMPANIES—WORTHLESS LANDS FOR THE GOVERNMENT.

3. But still worse, this proposition is a mere scheme to impose upon the Government millions of acres of land at $2.50 an acre which is not worth ten cents for each thousand acres. The Union Pacific Company is entitled to 12,000,000 acres. Its lands east of the one hundredth meridian were valuable, but these are sold or withheld from the proposition.

The company will undoubtedly select its most worthless lands for release to the United States. Does any man believe that if this company could make more money out of these lands that it would release to the United States? If the lands are profitable at this price, let the companies keep them; if not, the Government does not want them.

The six millions of refuse lands left in such a selection are as bar-ren as the rainless desert of Sahara. A vast alkali desert uninhabited and almost uninhabitable at $2.50 an acre! If the lands had natural fertility, which they have not, as a general rule they are in a region without rain, and they are inaccessible to water. They are worth no more than so much land in the moon.

It is urged that the price of $2.50 an acre "is but the equivalent of about seventy-five cents per acre, cash in hand, for the reason that the debt is not due for an average of twenty-three years to come, and this latter sum, invested at 6 per cent. interest, with its accumulations," will, at the expiration of that period, amount to the former sum. (Letter of vice-president Central Pacific, in views of minority, part 2 Report No. 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 15.) But this is by no means correct. The company is bound to pay interest on the subsidy bonds. If there can be a credit now of $15,000,000 on the principal, the effect is that the Government pays $2.50 an acre now.

THE GOVERNMENT ULTIMATELY TO LOSE THE LANDS.

4. This scheme requires the credit of $15,000,000 to be made when a release of the lands is made to the United States. It leaves the lands subject to the land-grant and sinking-fund mortgages upon them. It does not require the proceeds of sales of other lands to be applied in releasing the mortgages on these. It does require, as the Senate bill would seem to indicate, that—

Said company shall also provide and maintain any necessary sinking funds for the redemption of all such land-grant and sinking-fund bonds.

It also provides that—

Whenever any of the lands [released to the Government] shall be sold by the Government said company shall pay to the trustees under said land-grant or sinking-fund mortgages an amount sufficient to release and discharge said lands so sold by the Government from all claim under said mortgages against said lands.

That is handsomely stated! "Whenever" any lands shall be sold!

Distance lends enchantment to the view.

The day of judgment is probably a long period in the future, but nothing as compared to the endless future "whenever" these lands will be sold. And we are to accept the promise of these companies without security in any form.

PROMISES NEVER TO BE FULFILLED.

No mode is provided for enforcing the creation of the sinking fund or for the payment to the trustees. Any future legislation to enforce these duties would be met with the cry of vested rights and the violation of the charter contract.

The result might and probably would be that the company would get credit for the $15,000,000, the price of the lands, and then the lands would be sold out under a foreclosure of the mortgage, and the Government lose its title.

Then we may be met with another modest inquiry, whether in consequence of the shrinkage in the value of the lands the Government "may not honorably share in this inevitable shrinkage." Its share would be a large share—all.

RELEASE OF DUTIES.

5. The fifth section of the Senate bill seems to be so drawn as to release the company from the duty to keep its road in repair and use after the subsidy bonds shall be paid.

But I will not pursue the objections which exist to this whole scheme, and which is supposed to meet the wishes of this company.

The Senate bill No. 687 in relation to the Central Pacific Company is substantially similar to that in relation to the Union Pacific.

The whole scheme of the companies, as I understand it, seems to me so destitute of justice, so outrageous in its demands, so bald a swindle that it deserves only the mature consideration necessary to repudiate and reject it with an emphasis and unanimity that will place it beyond resurrection.

A PLAN TO DISCOUNT THE CLAIMS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

6. It is a part of the proposition of the companies that they shall each "be entitled at any time, whenever its financial condition will allow, to pay to the Government, in lieu of the semi-annual payments" proposed by them, "which may remain to be made before the full payment and extinguishment of the balance of the Government claim, the then present value of all such future semi-annual payments, computed according to an interest rate of 6 per cent. per annum; and upon such payment of the present value, the said balance of the Government claim shall be discharged without further semi-annual payments." That is, they propose to first impair and cut down the value of an acknowledged debt—the subsidy bonds and interest payable at a future day—by declaring that the Government shall not apply in liquidation of current interest advanced by the United States, the 5 per cent. of net earnings, and half services, as the law now authorizes, and then to increase the value of their payments by putting them on compound interest until the maturity of the debt.

Having thus cut down the debt on one end and augmented the means of paying at the other, they propose to reserve a right to buy in at a discount a debt thus impaired in value. It is one of the intricacies of the progressive increase of compound interest that $1 put on compound interest will in a sufficient length of time pay a million on simple interest. The companies first propose to create a sinking fund on this principle and to make a discount on the sum they are to pay largely more than the Government could realize on the sum so to be advanced.

In point of mathematical ingenuity this scheme is so sublime that only a skilled actuary could sufficiently admire its strategy or compute the extent of the new sacrifice it proposes for the Government!

Here are three specific losses to the Government:

1. The millions of loss by a surrender of the right to credit 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services on current advances of interest;

2. The millions of loss by allowing compound interest on sums to meet advances of interest, without any interest on such advances; and, finally,

3. The millions of loss by the proposed discount on sums so payable to the Government.

In view of this proposition it is a little difficult to perceive the force of the assertion that these companies are unable to pay the proposed sinking fund. They are so well satisfied of their ability that even now they are laying their plans to discount their liability to the Government.

THIS OR NOTHING.

Will it be said it is better to accept these lands because if Congress does not the Government will ultimately get nothing?

But this assumption rests on an error of fact. Congress can enforce its demands. If a security by way of lien on the lands be desirable, Congress could create it by law. (House Miscellaneous Document No. 16, third session Forty-first Congress.)

THERE IS AMPLE REMEDY FOR THE GOVERNMENT.

And there is at least one remedy which could be applied, but which no man desires to apply; certainly I do not. Congress could for sufficient reasons repeal the charter conferred by acts of Congress, or cause its forfeiture on quo warranto, and sell out the corporate franchises to a new company or companies. (House Report No. 440, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 164.)

The power of repeal is not limited to the same extent as the power to alter or amend.

If these companies continue to resist every demand, however just, if they resolve to defy all law and contemn every dictate of justice, we may at last be driven to inquire of each one of them—

"Quosque tandem abutere patientia nostra? Quamdiu etiam furor iste tuus nos eludet? Quem ad finem esse effrenata jactabit audacia?"

The extreme power is reserved by the fifth section of the act of 1862 to the Government to take possession of the roads for the use and benefit of the United States on their failure to redeem the subsidy bonds. These I know are extreme remedies never to be resorted to so long as any other remains, but it is by no means true that all is lost, and that the Government is under the necessity of accepting the fragmentary and worthless lands left after all having any value shall be first selected for the companies.

The remedies are abundant and the power complete to secure full indemnity to the Government if Congress will enact the necessary law.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the bill now before the House, I appeal to you, and to the representatives of the toiling, taxed, and tax-paying people, to protect them from burdens which in law, and all good conscience, should rest upon these great and greatly-favored corporations. I appeal to you in the name of that justice which is the sole purpose of the bill, and which will sanction and sanctify it in the estimation of our constituents, and in the impartial history of the great hereafter. In the name of that Constitution which recognizes, protects, defends, and enforces the obligations of contracts, I demand that these corporations shall not be permitted to leave theirs unperformed. In the name of the illustrious men who conceived the mighty project of uniting by rail and telegraph the two oceans that wash our eastern and western shores, I demand that their consummated work shall never be dishonored with the recollection of violated faith and fraud in the broken promises of these corporations. In this centennial year of our national existence, in the assembled presence of illustrious representatives of every civilized power of the earth, while dealing with the most magnificent highway of the world, the crowning glory of all our internal improvements, which almost greets the sun in his rising at Plymouth Rock and follows his course across the continent to the Golden Gate, which opens the treasures of a continent to the Pacific Ocean and the commerce of untold millions of people, let it never be said that the Constitution is powerless to enforce the obligation of contracts or that the American Congress is without the courage to exercise the authority it has given for this purpose.

In the name of every corporation in the land, representing all our varied industries, giving employment to the enterprising and toiling millions of our population, I demand that these agencies for creating wealth and securing happiness and prosperity throughout our wide domain shall not be involved in the common odium that to some extent must rest upon all, if these greatest of commercial corporations shall be guilty of broken faith and violated honor. Let us cherish but yet control by just laws all the institutions of our country, among which are unnumbered corporations created for every conceivable purpose, and everywhere dispensing good among men. The Government itself is a gigantic corporation, established to "provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity" forever.

Corporations are the agencies through which commerce traverses every ocean and is carried over every land. They build and operate our manufactories which display the wonder-working skill, genius, and enterprise of our people. They penetrate the earth in search of the treasures of coal and iron and petroleum and copper and lead and zinc and tin and cinnabar and silver and gold that are garnered under our wide-spreading plains, or hid away under rugged mountain ranges. They operate the machinery that prints our books and sends the newspapers to the door of every citizen of the Republic. They build colleges and conduct schools for the education of our children. They print the Bible and send the glad tidings of the gospel to every people. They erect churches to the true and living God and provide the means by which His ministers "go preach the gospel to every creature."

Let them all be made to obey the precepts of truth, honor, and justice born of heaven and proclaimed for the common good of all.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Chairman, the Representative of a generous constituency who at such an hour as this would underestimate the great responsibility which devolves upon him cannot but be unfaithful to his high trust and to his country.

It is no idle honor to occupy a desk within this audience Chamber of the nation in the centennial year of its existence, when on the one hand exulting freemen mingle with loud acclaim their rejoicings at the progress of constitutional liberty as freighted with the wealth which time has gathered for them. All nations, all creeds, and all opinions lay their common offerings upon the altars of our country's progress.

The scene is strange; it is more, it is bewildering. The procession of the nations to attest our progress is assured. They come from every quarter and from every isle with the tributes of their industry, their wisdom, and their skill. Within our harbors the peaceful navies of the world shall ride, and by the richness of their contributions find an anchorage within the hearts of American freemen.

It is a splendid spectacle; a glowing page in the annals of the world's great history; a light-house in the ocean waste; an oasis in the desert sands of time, where humanity, worn and wearied, may give pause and invoke its higher, better destiny.

Time marches resistlessly onward in the development of events with wondrous strides. We pause as hoary monarchies enriched with spoils attest our greatness. The sword is sheathed; the spear has become a pruning-hook; and yet, with all these evidences of our greatness, with all these biddings to a newer prosperity than we yet have known, as the mighty arm of labor swings to invention's chime, a flush is seen upon the national countenance that bodes no good within.

Statesmen, tell us of the hour; what its signs of promise are; why, with all these elements of prosperity, does want of confidence exist; why does labor languish, and why the folded sails of commerce that have spread to every breeze and borne over every wave our banner with its stripes and stars?

The tremendous energies of war have we know been felt, but the smoke of the conflict has long since died away and over the graves of the actors upon either side tender hands and loving hearts have strewn with flowers the evidences of an unfading love, and with solemn ritual and Christian hope greet their immortal spirits year by year with a reverent hail and farewell.

The tributes we pay to their memories would be but idle did we not carry within our hearts the resolve to do something that shall give greater consecration to the memories of our soldier dead by the bestowment of our better energies to the proper solution of the great questions of public import on which hang the destinies of our Union and its grand or inglorious future.

These questions can alone be settled here, not in the simple light of party prejudice and party zeal, but on the higher plane of a statesmanship which can control the confidence and the sanction of the American citizen. It is not for want of capital, for its accumulation is awaiting exercise more than ever before. It is not for want of labor, for a million of stalwart men with uplifted hands appeal for work; the forge is idle and the workshop closed, while the hour that gives announcement to the stranger of the glory of our institutions yet finds those very institutions on a greater and severer trial than when they firmly stood beneath the iron hail of war and from a hundred battle-fields the crimsoned torrents flowed with the blood of brothers in the struggle for union and for freedom.

By common consent were remitted to the Forty-fourth Congress these questions of high and solemn import. The great body of a free people care less for party than for principle, and if American manhood and American statesmanship clothed with the high prerogatives of power are unequal to the task, where shall we find the remedy? Not in differences arising from sectional opinions, for of these there should be none. Not by the East and the North, where vast amounts of capital are awaiting remunerative investment. Not by the South, as she girds herself anew in the race for a higher prosperity than she has ever known, and bids you with yearning look believe she will be true forever to that Union which in an hour of madness she spurned; nor yet by the West, whose giant energies are so rapidly expanding to their fullest development, from where their shores of empire are laved by inland seas to where the traveler stands within that Golden Gate where California bids the world a welcome and crowns her commerce with diadems of gold; but in the union of all these knowing no distinctions which shall adjust the harmony between capital and labor, the only true basis of a real and permanent national greatness.

Come, then, representatives of earth's greatest republic, and as we weave together for her the crowns of laurel to attest her greatness and the benignity of her institutions, see if we may not agree upon some plan by which prejudices may be blotted out forever and the love of country find a higher devotion than the love of party and animosities which party spirit are so apt to generate. Mr. Chairman, I am of New Jersey, proud of her history and of her progress, and to New Jersey I must be true. How can all these things be, she asks of her representatives to-day. What is the measure of statesmanship required, and why may not her industries thrive, her children find employment, and hope and confidence again bear sway where distrust and dismay so long have reigned?

How stands the case? Two thousand millions of debt confront us. It must be paid though wrung from toil, for a nation's honor and a nation's faith may not be loosely trampled in the dust. We are writing and enacting history, and the example of our Republic will give glory to our institutions or bury their proud name forever.

We have solved thus far successfully great problems of government which in the ages past have confounded the wisdom of philosophy and the science of statesmanship. Wresting a continent from savages, denying the exactions of false rule, commanding independence, achieving victory over hoary monarchy, this nation seemed the offspring of time to bear the tidings of peace and good-will to men. Had not an overruling Providence thus designed it, when withheld so long from civilization, and erected the eternal barrier of three thousand miles of oceans—imperial domain—between the establishment and conservation of its liberties and the protests by arms of interferance from the despotism of the world at large?

When again her ancient enemy sought to reconquer the domain her treachery to liberty had lost, invasion was repulsed as on the land and on the sea we won the victor's wreath, and by repeated triumphs of gallantry and skill achieved no doubtful title to respect and confidence.

The third great trial has occurred, and been decided; its power to allay dissensions within itself; and now State vies with State to yield devotion to the Union and the great principles on which it was primarily established.

The issues with which we have to deal are of the present, and by the present they must be adjusted. They confront us each day in our legislation; give pause and hesitation to each bill we pass, each vote we give, for on our country's faith and credit all else must hang suspended in the balance. For the people we must legislate and by the people we must be judged.

It is now more than sixteen years since the war cloud lowered, changing all our preconcieved notions of finance. Various had been the systems adopted by the several States. From the wrecks of former panics, which had shaken from center to circumferance our busy industries and arrested the giant arms of labor, new systems had gradually been evolved. In many States the institutions organized for purposes of banking were alone dependent upon the good faith and common honesty of those to whom their interests were intrusted. It was public honor founded upon private faith. For a time all was well, until the frequent recurrence of stringency in the money mart forced home circulation to an alarming extent, and the people, becoming distrustful, hesitated in their acceptance.

From this state of affairs arose the security system, whereby the bill-holder was rendered secure in the deposit of public stocks in the departments of state of States thus enacting, and at such rate of value as would redeem at par, so far as human foresight could determine, their several issues. Then come panic or distress. The people or bill-holders who accepted these issues were secure.

New York as early as 1838 gave to it her adoption, and New Jersey followed some years after.

But with all these precautions something yet seemed wanting, and when the war-cloud lowered the public stocks of States which had been pledged for bank circulation became affected; the banks at great loss were obliged to deposit securities to cover the depreciation, until finally obliged to sell them at great loss and find investment in the bonds of the Government. When this necessity arose the banks became practically founded under a system of national credit, for their securities were national and their circulation was based upon it, and thus in the conflicts of the rebellion the national-banking act had its birth. The banks became the aiders and supporters of the war. A currency founded upon the national faith was, through the banks, at once created. The sinews of war were thus supplied, and our very existence rendered secure by the means thus adopted to give confidence to a patriot soldiery.

Thus incorporated into our system of finance, it must of necessity enter largely in the consideration of any plans which Congress may adopt looking to a solution of the problems of finance. What it has done in the past may not be ignored. It has stood through every test, giving confidence alike to depositor and to bill-holder; and if any monopoly exists, it is that of the public confidence, which refuses to be shaken. It belongs to no creed; it is allied to no party, while the only reason ventured for its repeal is the strongest which can be urged for its continuance; it is founded upon the nation's faith, and has sustained the nation's credit. While depositing as the security for the redemption of its circulating notes, it gives to the people from Maine to Texas and from seaboard to seaboard its notes of credit current in every section with the Union as their indorser and the security for their redemption.

The one great difficulty lies in the issue of 6 per cent. gold bonds, which by reason of their great security became an object of investment by the people of Europe, who amid the revolutions which so often threaten them are bidden to look hitherward for their sources of investment; and why? Because nothing so stable as republican liberty, nothing so secure as the empire which breaks the shackles of the slave, and permits the undeveloped freedom of the race to find its freest exercise. Though thus is complimented our national strength in the various marts of the world's great enterprise, yet we must be true to ourselves and win back our national securities, which have found such lodgement abroad, in order that we may more effectually control our own indebtedness and provide the remedies for its earlier adjustment.

The national banks, now falsely considered as monopolies, may be made conducive to the national credit as its chief aiders and supporters.

Permit me, then, to suggest the remedy whereby all cry of monopoly may be estopped and their continuance encouraged as a necessity to the State and to the nation. The people care not what plan you may adopt, so that their interests are secure and the promises to pay offered them in the multitudinous transactions of every-day life are beyond dispute. The wretched State-bank system, with notes unsecured, had well-nigh destroyed the public confidence, and for one who traversed many States the metallic currency was necessary to save imposition from the bill-brokers, who thrived in their occupations founded upon a distrust of confidence of State with State. To-day, whether the traveler has a note of the national banks or of the greenback currency, he feels secure.

A currency thus guarded would seem to need no defense, and institutions thus created ought to be beyond the prejudices of monopoly. Root them out and sure ruin awaits us, for they are governed by men of all parties and of all creeds. It is said the Government pays tax on their issues, and how? The bonds they hold are but a part of the indebtedness which the Government owes. The banks are but the investors, such as each individual is who has faith in the national honor, and expects and has a right to expect a return for the moneys invested; and thus in round numbers the banks are the holders of three hundred and seventy-five millions of Government bonds.

My proposition is this: to issue five hundred millions of 4 per cent. bonds, to be used by the banks as a collateral security for the notes issued to them, the bonds thus issued to be paid in fifty years. The banks can make sale of their 6 per cent. gold bonds and find investment in the 4 per cent. bonds, which will yield them a compensatory interest, as upon their pledge at the national Treasury a circulation at 90 per cent. can be issued. In the same proportion as the 4 per cent. bonds are issued the 6 per cent. bonds can be retired and the Government thus saved the payment of $16,000,000 gold interest. The bonds will readily be absorbed by the banks, the interest saved by the retirement of the 6 per cent. gold-bearing bonds will be kept within our own country, and banking will then be practically free, because the new bonds will command a simple par value, and new institutions starting under the law making banking free will be enabled to make fair purchase with which to make pledge at the Treasury for circulation issued while they part with the present gold-bearing bonds at a premium and secure to themselves the benefits resulting therefrom.

More than one hundred and twenty millions of legal-tender notes are now lying in the vaults of the banks as so much idle paper, because necessary to maintain the reserve required by law. Why should not this be utilized in the purchase of the bonds which would answer the purposes of the reserve and at the same time be a profit to the bank? There can be no purpose in the law requiring the banks to hold a reserve against their circulation and deposits which would not be as fully met by a reserve consisting of Government bonds as by one composed of legal-tender notes. In cases of emergency requiring a resort to the reserve of the banks for the purposes for which it is intended the bonds could at all times be converted into legal-tender notes in the market at a day's notice, while if counted at their par value only they would form a reserve of additional value over that of the greenbacks to the extent of the premium. It would be an advantage to the general business interests of the country, because without any addition to or inflation of the legal-tender currency it would release from the vaults of the banks and place at the disposal of business so much of the legal-tender currency now rendered inactive and comparatively useless as should be set free by the bonds of the Government in the reserves of the banks.

Does it not appear that we should endeavor to apply some means which may combine heartily the capital of the nation in its behalf, that we may secure something like stability on the part of our boasted form of government and quiet the trust-to-chance order of things which has been too much the history of the past in banking as a system, and provide for the future some plan which may elevate the native dignity and intelligence of forty-five millions of people, and that shall foster and encourage a healthy growth of commerce which can alone sustain the supremacy of any nation upon the earth for any length of time? and for this fact we have only to search the histories of Rome, of Venice, and of the Netherlands, and in the present age the British Empire of Great Britain. It may be said that a nation living upon two islands scarcely larger than our own Empire State to-day holds the purse-strings of the world, dictating laws to and levying tribute upon two hundred millions in India, ten thousand miles away from these little island-homes of these Anglo Saxons, our progenitors, and dictating peace or war to five hundred millions of civilized men.

Look back for the foundation and the cause for this fearful reach of power on the part of that nation, and what do we find is the underlying secret of this vast success. It is this: Well regulated commerce, well regulated finances, the fostering care of the private citizen in every relation of public or of private life which that citizen may see fit to occupy; protection to his natural rights always and at any cost.

Stability in our system of banking is the very nerve and life-blood of commerce, and without which it must linger and die, and our seaboard cities, instead of attaining to what the Queen of the Adriatic was, become what Venice now is.

The folded sails of commerce and a prostrated industry invite us to reflect not alone upon our condition, but to the enactment of positive measures of relief. Has the national-banking act performed its mission? Have the people given to it their support? And what are the reasons alleged for its repeal? Various have been the arguments used against it, the most prominent of which have been termed its monopolizing features. It was called into existence by the necessities of a disordered finances, rendered thus disordered by the stern arbitrament of war. The metallic currency was not sufficient by which armies could be raised and a patriot soldiery mustered for the tented field.

The nation had the right to use whatever of its resources the preservation of its life demanded. Thus were swept away the banks of State organization, that but one currency founded upon public faith might give renewed confidence to the threatened fortunes of the Republic. A new spirit was infused in the soldier's breast that his country was not unmindful of his valor as he gave the awful pledge of life to her service, and that if he fell amid the shock of battle, his family would find protection. If it did no more than this, and still performed its mission as the sweet wings of peace were spread over a restored Union, it should cause calumny to cease and invoke the sentiment of gratitude from all. Since its enactment nearly thirteen years have passed. No disaster or disasters have followed in its wake; its provisions are now more liberal than ever; it belongs to no party, is controlled by no section, offers its advantages to all who seek them, and gives to all the States a currency unapproached in security and preserved from the manipulations imposed upon doubtful State issues. This is its crowning feature, that during the long years of war and of peace not a dollar has been lost to the bill-holders, who are the people themselves.

What monopoly can attach to a system which bears upon its very face a perfect freedom, requiring every safeguard in its management, and so far as the interests of toil are concerned placed beyond the reach of peril?

By the repeal of the national-banking act one of two plans must be adopted, namely: a return to the system of State banks, or the issue by the Government of what is known as the greenback currency.

The first found its full condemnation by the people, who had grown restive under their constant failures, but yet were obliged to receive them in the ordinary operations of trade. When strictures in the market occurred and panic was breathed upon the public ear, terror and dismay followed in their long train of disaster, and the unsecured promises became but worthless paper, labor was cheated of its reward, and the arms of industry were palsied.

As to the second or greenback currency, shall the Government issue its notes as the requirements of the national Treasury may demand, and what limit shall be set to the public confidence?

What wondrous schemes shall be unfolded of internal improvements to demand their issue at the enactment of Congress until the land shall be flooded with promises to pay at the instance of political gamblers, to be rejected by the laborer in proportion as its value shall decrease by the immensity of its issue and the counterfeits which will be made upon it!

There can be but one way out of the wilderness in which we now are to the green fields of the public confidence. We must curtail our vast expenditures and give assurance that the road we travel is toward a gradual but sure and positive resumption; that it can be done as contemplated by the resumption act of 1875 I cannot believe. A proper extension will answer. The shrinkages of value, already enormous, will greatly increase. In view of this the banks are already making return of large amounts of their circulation to avoid the possibilities and penalties of that act. Yet with all this there should be no extension until the public confidence is assured of some positive enactment by Congress that its extension will not be used as an argument for their still greater enemy, inflation. We are to-day far richer than any nation upon earth; have more of value within ourselves of all that conduces to the wants and the happiness of our people. Let but the words of "confidence restored" again be spoken and the wheels of industry will again revolve and heavier strokes of labor fall upon the anvil of the nation's greatness. The want of these by a sound, assured system of finance is the cause of all our misery; deprives real estate of its proper value; produces uncertainty in all the relations of business, and prevents the investment of capital and the restoration of its harmony with labor.

A moderate tariff to defray the revenues of Government and provide for the payment of the interest upon the public debt must be maintained until the debt is greatly reduced. We must by every law of nature give protection to our own industries while struggling for their very life. The future is filled with hope, the clouds have each a silver lining.

The people are not prepared to ruthlessly abandon on the one hand a system of banking which has so well conserved their purposes and produced over sixty-five millions of revenue to the Government since their organization and have only received in return three million six hundred thousand for their expenses, nor will they on the other hand reject all the lessons of history which teach us that that nation alone can find enduring happiness which plants its operations upon positive values and adjusts itself to their proper measure.

Mr. Chairman, from my association with the national banks for a period dating from their first organization, it was not my purpose, nor did I suppose an occasion in the national Legislature would have arisen to have urged any arguments in their defense, but from some quarters here the language of invective has so often been applied that it occurred to me a few words fitly spoken would not be misconstrued.

Sir, we are in no condition for radical changes in our system of finance. When the nation, by its industry and thrift, shall have rolled from its shoulders this Herculean debt, then we may adopt some new system or remand the entire question back to the several States. But, until that is done, preserve them in all their integrity, and, above all, I pray you preserve them from the attacks of partisan malice. They have not entered the field of politics or sought to be ingrafted in political platforms. For those of New Jersey I speak with pride and satisfaction. Their mission has been beneficent and honorable. Conservative in all their action, they but reflect the character New Jersey so proudly sustains. With the same spirit ingrafted upon every State, our Union will be secure forever, and no sunderings of plighted faith disturb our progress as we cross the threshold of our second centennial, the wonder, the welcome, and the glory of the world.

APPENDIX.

An estimate of the total taxation of the national banks for the ten years ending in 1875 has been made, by assuming the rate of State taxation in the years in which no returns were made to this Office to have been the same as the known rate in the years which immediately preceded them. For the years 1872 and 1873 the necessary allowance has been made in the estimate for the amount of the income and license tax and the stamp tax on promissory notes, which taxes had then been repealed. Such estimate is shown in the following table:

Years.	Capital stock.	Amount of taxes.			Ratios to capital.
		United States.	State.	Total.	United States.	State.	Total.

*The amount collected by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from State banks, savings-banks, and private banks and bankers during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was as follows:

On deposits	$2, 972, 260 27
On capital	1, 102, 241 58
On circulation	†22, 746 27
Total	4, 097, 248 12

†Of this amount $11,627.92 was derived from the tax of 10 per cent. upon unauthorized circulation.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LORD. I move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock this evening for the purpose of general debate on the subject of the Geneva award.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, for Friday and Saturday next.

To Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, for ten days.

To Mr. CLYMER for four days from the 15th instant on account of important business.

To Mr. TUCKER for eight days on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his motion to adjourn, so I may move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock for debate on the Geneva award bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn for that purpose.

Mr. PAGE. Does the order that the session shall be for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted, extend over to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or some other member of the committee, that by unanimous consent that order be extended so as to include to-morrow.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object, because I want the Army appropriation bill taken up to-morrow under the five-minute rule, and disposed of.

Mr. LORD. I now ask for the vote on my motion that there be an evening session at eight o'clock, to go on with the debate on the Geneva award bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a point of order. I understand, under the arrangement made by unanimous consent yesterday, that to-day no business should be transacted, but that the session should be for debate only, and debate only on the Army appropriation bill. I ask the Chair to decide whether the motion of the gentleman from New York is in order under that unanimous action of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has before his eye that order as it appears in the RECORD. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not make the point of order with any view of antagonizing the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LORD.] I have made it simply that the order of the House may be observed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order is absolute that yesterday and to-day be devoted to general debate on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. LORD. Then I move that the House take a recess till eight o'clock, when gentlemen may speak on the Army appropriation bill if they see fit. That will give an opportunity for general debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves that the House take a recess till eight o'clock for the purpose of discussing further generally the Army bill. Is there objection?

Mr. PAGE. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. PAGE. We have been here all day and have a very thin House. I think we should adjourn, and call for a division.

The question being taken by a rising vote, the Chair announced 20 ayes. Before the negative vote was counted,

Mr. PAGE said: There is evidently not a quorum present. I make the point that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair observes the fact that there is no quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, memorials, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. PARSONS: The petition of Jacob Klatter, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. PLAISTED: The petition of Caleb Holyoke and others, owners of the brig Itasca, destroyed by confederate cruisers, to be indemnified for said loss out of the Geneva award fund, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RIDDLE: Papers relating to the petition of J. D. Bond & Brother, of Wilson County, Tennessee, for the refunding of internal-revenue taxes illegally assessed against and collected from him, to the Committee of Claims.

Also, papers relating to the claims of Torrance Kirby, of Sumner County, Tennessee, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 15, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday last was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 2752) to change the name of the schooner Mayflower;

A bill (H. R. No. 3200) to change the name of the steam-barge Dolphin, of Clayton, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 3678) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Lydia to that of Sylph; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3688) to amend an act entitled "An act supplementary to the acts in relation to immigration," approved March 3, 1875.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 3398) for the issue of coin, and other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin.

The bill (H. R. No. 2860) to facilitate and encourage philosophical, mechanical, and scientific exhibitions and experiments at the centennial exhibition was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desire to record my opposition to the motion. I think the Senate should recede from its amendments to the bill. I will not call the yeas and nays, however, at this time upon the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. WITHERS were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bills, which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

An act (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1071) for the relief of Lieutenant James B. Sinclair, United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1800) for the relief of Kendrick & Avis; Kuner, Ziscmann & Zott; Kuner & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri; and Nachtrieb & Co., of Galion, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds;

A bill (H. R. No. 2140) establishing Cheboygan, in the State of Michigan, a port of delivery;

A bill (H. R. No. 2434) to amend section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to extradition;

A bill (H. R. No. 3573) to amend an act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, approved December 28, 1874; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2134) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 922) for the relief of Crary & Carter; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 15, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WILLIAM HARPER AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers in the case of William Harper and others; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BONDING MARBLE IN BLOCKS.

Mr. CHAPIN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2867) to amend section 2958 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill, which was read, proposes to amend section 2958 of the Revised Statutes by adding in the sixth line, after the words "other merchandise," the words "and marble in blocks may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be bonded in open yards, under the care of an officer of customs, at the expense of the owner or importer."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHAPIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE IN THE DISTRICT.

On motion of Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 525) to amend section 994 of the Revised Statutes relating to justices of the peace in the District of Columbia was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN BOYLE.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3729) granting a pension to John Boyle; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

J. R. MAURAN AND OTHERS.

Mr. COCHRANE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1043) for the relief of J. R. Mauran, J. D. Price, H. Norris, and others; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

J. D. SIMMS AND S. V. TURNER.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3730) to remove the political disabilities of John D. Simms and Samuel V. Turner, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GOODE. I ask that the bill may now be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It removes from John D. Simms and Samuel V. Turner, of Virginia, all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States by reason of participation in the late civil war.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would ask the gentleman whether petitions in the ordinary form have been filed?

Mr. GOODE. Yes, sir; that has been done in both cases.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELISHA C. BENNETT.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3731) granting a pension to Elisha C. Bennett; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. BROWN.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3732) for the relief of John T. Brown; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS F. CARTER.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3733) for the relief of Thomas F. Carter; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. M. HAMILTON.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the petition of Captain J. M. Hamilton, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, for change in date of commission; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AMOS B. FERGUSON.

Mr. HURLBUT, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 82) for the relief of Amos B. Ferguson; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

L. DAVIS AND A. REES.

Mr. HURLBUT also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) for the relief of Lawrence Davis and August Rees, of the Twenty-third United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. NEEDHAM.

Mr. HURLBUT also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of William H. Needham; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REDEMPTION OF NATIONAL-BANK GOLD-NOTES.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3734) providing for the redemption of national-bank notes payable in gold at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

MARIA W. SANDERS.

Mr. JENKS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 375 for the relief of Maria W. Sanders, and that it be now considered by the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to state that I objected the other day to this proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS,] but since then having learned the purport of the bill I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which objections to its present consideration will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Maria W. Sanders, of Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania, upon the list of pensioners, as the widow of Brevet Major John Sanders, at the rate of $50 per month, to commence from the 1st day of March, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

The amendment proposed was to strike out "$50" and insert "$30," and to strike out the words "to commence from the 1st day of March, 1861, and."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] will give some reasons for this bill.

Mr. JENKS. There are several reasons for its passage. The application in this case was made in 1860, but not acted upon; and the war coming on, it was not renewed until the last Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there should be no partiality shown in bills of this class. I would ask that the report in this case be read.

Mr. RANDALL. The trouble is that some injustice has already been done in this case by the arbitrary objection of some person in Committee of the Whole when this bill was reached.

Mr. JENKS. When the Private Calendar was under consideration on an objection day, by mistake this bill was objected to when it was reached.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make some explanation of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. JENKS. There is a report of the Senate committee, which the Clerk can read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the petitioner is the widow of Brevet Major John Sanders, late of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, who died on the 29th day of July, 1858, as is believed in consequence of disease contracted in the Mexican war and subsequent exposure in the line of duty; that he entered the Army in 1834, having graduated second in the class of that year, and served with faithfulness and distinction in the Engineer Corps until the time of his death, about twenty-four years, embracing the whole period of the war with Mexico, when exposure and laborious effort impaired his constitution; that he died while engaged in superintending and directing the works on Reed Island, in the Delaware, leaving a widow and seven children.

Mrs. Sanders applied for a pension in 1860-'61, but the petition was not acted on, and, the war soon thereafter commencing, the application was not renewed until the last Congress, when no decisive action was taken, and it is now renewed.

Though not coming within the provisions of the general pension laws, your committee regard the case as one of sufficient merit to justify a special act for the relief of Mrs. Sanders, and find abundant precedent to justify such action in the records of Congress in connection with this subject.

They would therefore recommend the passage of the bill, (S. No. 375,) with an amendment fixing the amount of pension at $30 per month, and striking out the words "from the 1st day of March, 1861," and inserting "from the approval of this act."

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve my right to object until the bill is again reported.

The Clerk again reported the bill and proposed amendment as before.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see nothing remarkable about this bill, except the fact that it does not even appear that this officer died in consequence of wounds received or of sickness incurred while in the service of the United States. There is a belief expressed that such may have been the fact, but it is not asserted in the report as a fact.

The Senate have thought proper to pass this bill. Congress perhaps is not too liberal in granting pensions; I am certain it is not too liberal in granting pensions to the widows of the private soldiers of the Army. If I might make a single suggestion to my young friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] it would be this: if it was urged more frequently in this House that pensions be granted to widows of private soldiers instead of the extraordinary pressure which is so often made here in behalf of officers' widows, I should consider it more in harmony with the proper policy and duty of Congress. With the proposed amendment I will not raise any objection to the bill.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment which has been reported.

Mr. JENKS. There was an error in reporting that amendment. It is an amendment which has been already agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood that it was an amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House.

Mr. JENKS. It was an amendment reported to the Senate, and agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish any mistake about this. The bill as read by the Clerk proposed to give $50 per month, while the amendment proposed to reduce the pension to $30 a month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk read the printed copy of the bill as first introduced in the Senate. The Clerk will now read the bill as passed by the Senate and now before the House.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Maria W. Sanders, of Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania, upon the list of pensioners, as the widow of Brevet Major John Sanders, at the rate of $30 per month, to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JENKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARGARET KEENAH.

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3735) granting a pension to Margaret Keenah; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be allowed a clerk for the further term of one month from the 6th day of June, 1876, whose compensation shall be $4 per day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, the call resting with the Committee on the Judiciary. The morning hour now begins at half past twelve o'clock. The regular order of to-day is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 3370) to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringement of patents, upon which the previous question was demanded, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. Is this the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports, and this bill comes up under that call as unfinished business.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is too late to make that motion; the Chair expected him to make the motion and would have recognized him had he risen.

Mr. HOLMAN. The motion to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is certainly in order. It is done by a majority vote only, but it stands on the same footing as a motion to suspend the rules which requires a two-third vote. The only difference is that this particular right pertains to appropriation bills only, and I submit therefore that that motion can be submitted at any time, and in the absence of a pending motion to suspend the rules is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is a privileged motion.

Mr. ATKINS. I certainly thought so; and I would state that I rose to address the Chair several times for the purpose of making that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour had begun at that time.

The question was taken on Mr. ATKINS's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have been trying to obtain the attention of the Chair. I desired before that motion was declared to submit to the gentleman from Tennessee, in consideration of the slimness of the House, the propriety as a matter of courtesy that he allow the general debate upon the Army bill to continue to-day, and that the bill shall not be taken up in detail to-day; and I hope that the gentleman will accept that modification.

Mr. ATKINS. In answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, I wish to say that as far as the members of the Committee on Appropriations are concerned they desire to treat gentlemen on the other side of the House with perfect courtesy in this matter: and if it is the wish of gentlemen not to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army bill, I do not desire to press my motion.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope then that by unanimous consent the House will agree that general debate shall go on to-day, no business to be transacted. I hope that will be done.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe the House is already in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has voted to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and awaits the pleasure of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to take the chair.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move that the committee rise in order to allow me to submit to the House the proposition I have made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that motion is put it is well enough to consider whether or not business can be transacted to any advantage to-day.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would rather adjourn.

Mr. ATKINS. There is no objection I think on this side of the House to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois; it seems to be one pretty generally entertained on the other side of the House. We do not desire to press the bill. It proposes no change in the laws, but there are reductions made in the bill which gentlemen on the other side may not agree to; and as the House is thin, on that side at least, I hope our friends on this side will not oppose the suggestion.

Mr. LUTTRELL. We will want the same privilege next week.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask if gentlemen on the other side object to going on with the details of the bill to-morrow.

Mr. HURLBUT. Not at all; I do not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the committee rise for that purpose, or if we agree in committee that to-day's business be limited to debate on this bill, I should wish to have it coupled with the further understanding that to-morrow the bill shall be taken up by paragraphs.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am content that it shall be taken up under the five-minute rule to-morrow.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the suggestion out of courtesy to gentlemen on the other side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that this is a modification of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, which should come properly before the House, so that the House may bind itself to this agreement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the committee will rise.

The question was taken on Mr. HURLBUT's motion, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Tennessee, that in view of the request made by the gentlemen upon the other side of the House that the only business of to-day shall be general debate on the pending bill, I trust that he will agree to it, and that the further unanimous consent be given that the bill shall be proceeded with by paragraphs to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HURLBUT. Under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ATKINS. I would state in reply to the gentleman from Indiana that I desire to make a brief explanation of this bill when the House is full, and with the understanding that I shall have that opportunity I have no objection to the proposed arrangement. I shall not detain the House more than fifteen or twenty minutes, I think, at the utmost.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve that right to the gentleman, before the House proceeds to consider the bill, in my proposition.

Mr. REAGAN. I would suggest if it is not advisable that we shall go on with the call of committees. Many of the committees have reports which it is very desirable they shall get before the House, and I understand that there are now but two appropriation bills undisposed of. I suggest that to-morrow morning the committees should be called for reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks that to-day be devoted to general debate on the Army appropriation bill and that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, the bill shall be considered by paragraphs under the five-minute rule. Is there objection to that proposition?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman to make this modification, that members may discuss the Geneva award in the House after the House has been in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that that business may be disposed of.

Mr. ATKINS. I suppose that under the practice of the House gentlemen may discuss anything under an order for general debate if they want to. There is no restriction as to the Geneva award.

Mr. SPRINGER That bill is in the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. Could not by unanimous consent the debate on the Geneva award go on to-morrow and Saturday? I think that if we allow that time for its discussion we could get through the bill by Tuesday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that the session of to-day be for general debate only upon the Army appropriation bill?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. WITHERS.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up the legislative, &c., appropriation bill, which has just been returned from the Senate, in order that a committee of conference may be appointed on the part of the House to meet the one already appointed on the part of the Senate.

No objection was made, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table.

The House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and ordered that a committee of conference be appointed on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the House Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. FOSTER.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. LORD. I move that there be an evening session for the purpose of discussing the Geneva award bill.

The motion was agreed to.

SINKING FUND FOR THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to state to the House that on Tuesday next I shall call up the bill (H. R. No. 3676) to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein mentioned, and put it on its passage. It is the desire of the Committee on the Judiciary, informally expressed, that this should be done, and then it is understood to be the desire of the Committee on the Judiciary that on the next day a vote shall be taken on the bill to provide for the distribution of the Geneva award. I make this announcement now so that if any gentlemen desire to speak upon the bill they may do so before that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill to equalize the bounties of soldiers in the late war was made a special order in advance of the bill to which the gentleman referred. If the gentleman who has charge of that bill should be upon the floor on Tuesday, that bill will have precedence on that day.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We can possibly pass both of them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope so.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. There is another special order. The report of the Committee on the Texas Border Troubles has been a special order since the 20th of April last, and notice was given last Saturday that it would be called up, and it certainly comes in previous to the other bills which have been mentioned.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the first special order is the bill to which the gentleman from Texas refers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that a list of the special orders will be made out and published in the RECORD of to-morrow.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WABASH RIVER.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce a bill which was objected to the other day by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who at that time offered an amendment which the committee have instructed me to accept, and which is included in the bill I now propose to report.

There was no objection, and

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3736) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. BOONE. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes, with an amendment, and to ask that it be put on its passage now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. BOONE. I now ask that the amendment reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs be read together with the report of that committee.

Mr. HURLBUT. I make the point of order that the bill, making an appropriation, must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAGE. The bill has passed the Senate and is all right, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HURLBUT. Unless there is some urgent necessity for the passage of the bill, I must object to taking it up for consideration at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. There should be some delay before the bill is put upon its passage. The report has just been submitted and the bill is not in print.

Mr. BOONE. It seems important we should dispose of the proposition in some way. There is great probability of collision between United States forces and these Sioux Indians who are off their reservation.

Mr. HURLBUT. Is it to negotiate in reference to the title of the Sioux Nation of Indians to the Black Hills country?

Mr. BOONE. Yes; an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation.

Mr. HURLBUT. I withdraw the point of order on the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to renew the point of order, though I shall have to do so unless I can have time to consider the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. It has not been printed. It ought to be printed and carefully considered before it is put upon its passage. It is an important measure. It is an entering-wedge in reference to an important line of policy. I do not wish to object, however, to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have, then, to make the point of order that it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it makes an appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is obnoxious to the point of order in that it makes an appropriation in the second section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman, then, will allow me to reserve the point of order. I believe he will concede it is better not to have the bill go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the point of order, and therefore I hope he will agree to its postponement until the bill is printed and we shall have time to consider it.

Mr. BOONE. The gentleman from Indiana says the bill has not been considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean not considered in the House.

Mr. BOONE. It has been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it is now reported from that committee with an amendment and a report, which I have asked be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I say there has been no opportunity for the members to consider the bill. I have not read the bill and have not seen it until to-day. I knew such a bill had passed the Senate, but did not know what were its details until this morning. As it is a bill of much importance, we ought to have time to examine it carefully before it is put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on his point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, then, will be compelled under the rules to sustain the point of order, and send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOONE. I withdraw the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; let it be printed and recommitted.

Mr. BOONE. I move, then, that the bill and amendment, together with the accompanying report, be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by his Private Secretary, Mr. ULYSSES S. GRANT, jr., notified the House that he had approved and signed, June 12, an act (H. R. No. 1400) authorizing the residents and property-owners of Neville Township, county of Allegheny, State of Pennsylvania, to close the channel of the Ohio River, on the south side of Neville Island, by the construction of an embankment or causeway from the head of said island to the southern shore of said river; and

An act (H. R. No. 2826) to refund and remit certain duties to Peter Wright & Sons.

It further announced that the following bills, having been received by the President on the 2d of June, and not having been returned by him to the Senate within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become laws without his signature:

An act (H. R. No. 2459) for the relief of Theodore F. Miller, late private Company G, Third Regiment of Iowa Cavalry Volunteers; and

An act (H. R. No. 755) for the relief of Jackson T. Sorrells.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. This proceeding, Mr. Speaker, is all out of order. The House has resolved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the debate on the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the House has not yet agreed to suspend the rules and go into committee.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. TARBOX. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the wide range of debate the committee permits to comment with the brevity that defers to the age of the session, now venerable, and the urgent claims of legislative business, upon a topic of national concern that has largely interested public attention hitherto and threatens new controversies. It is the subject of Government aid and patronage to enterprises of a private sort, which, however worthy and public spirited, do not relate to the Federal functions, are of local or sectional rather than national scope, and by connection with which the Government involves itself in concerns and enters into obligations outside the proper and safe limit of its powers. I am provoked to this discussion, and justified in it, by the arguments and appeals, able and fervid, made here in recent debates by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] and the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. CULBERSON,] in support of a pledge of Government credit in aid of the construction by a private corporation of another line of railroad to the Pacific.

Early in the session this body, by an impressive majority of its members, put upon record its emphatic hostility to all Government grants of land, subsidies, or credit to any object not purely public and distinctively Federal in character. We shut and barred the doors of the Treasury vault against all assaults of private interest or importunity and dedicated every dollar in its coffers to public uses. This action, I doubt not, was the honest and patriotic judgment of this House and faithfully interpreted the intelligent sense of the country. And yet these gentlemen—in perfect sincerity, I am sure, for I know and honor them both as true men and honest legislators—while virtually abandoning hope of favorable consideration of their project now, appeal from this sternly hostile Congress to a future one, which they hope may be found more pliant to their design. While it is the clear right of the advocates of this measure to ask of the people in whose grasp the powers of government lie, and of a future Congress that the people shall put here to execute their will, to reverse our judgment in this matter, I am not content the appeal shall go forth hence to the country without a challenge in the name of the public opinion I speak for here.

Sir, we are urged to loan the nation's credit to a railroad corporation already richly endowed by gifts of the public domain and yet unable to support itself. I will not discuss the constitutionality of the proposition. If not unconstitutional it is impolitic, and I prefer to meet its advocates on that broader issue. And yet, sir, I am persuaded, however jurists may dispute or courts determine, the Constitution, as the fathers inspired it and as sound policy should construe it, gave no power to Congress to so appropriate the money or hypothecate the credit of the people. Sir, the power to take the substance of the individual citizen, whether under the right of eminent domain exercised over specific property, or under the right to levy and collect taxes, is of the highest prerogative of sovereignty. That prerogative can extend no further, consistent with inalienable popular rights, than the right to take property for public use, and to tax and apply the proceeds of taxation to the support of legitimate government functions. If it transcends these limits it becomes usurper and tyrant, and rebellion against it is virtue. So the father statesmen of the Republic taught, and such is our faith. Surely no constitution of government framed for the defense of liberty can perform a worthier civil office than the maintenance of these just boundaries of power. And I cannot credit, sir, that the wise men who a century ago proclaimed these principles and vindicated them in a historic war ever intended to clothe Government with authority to levy taxes on the industry and thrift of the people, to be loaned on good or doubtful or no security at all to private commercial corporations organized for private profit.

But I waive the constitutional objection for the purpose of the present debate. Politicians, I discover, are quite human, whatever their political creed, and prone to impatience of constitutional inhibitions and ingenious to circumvent a constitutional obstacle when it stands in the path of their interests or prejudices or ambitions. So careful constructionists as gentlemen who found no warrant in the Constitution for the appropriation of money for the public commemoration of the first completed century of the Republic see no constitutional impediment here. So I forbear to spend impotent breath in pleading the bar of the Constitution, and, stepping outside legal limits and defenses, oppose to the measure the objections urged by public policy and commercial morals, pausing only to refer for a moment to one position taken by the gentleman from Tennessee. He invokes the clauses of the Constitution relative to the establishment of post-roads and providing for the common defense and general welfare. The argument is familiar. It has served well hitherto as nepenthe to the congressional conscience against constitutional qualms. I do not care to revive the debate. Only, sir, if the latitude of construction contended for be admissible as to its other grants of power, the Constitution might as well be a blank page on which the administrators of Federal trusts may record whatever charter of prerogative their ambition or caprice dictates. Does there exist here, within the legal intent, a necessity of the public safety or convenience that summons the Government to exercise the power these clauses of the Constitution confer? If not, the discussion is over; for such need is the basis of authority. But, if the necessity does exist, then let the Government meet it in the direct and legitimate mode: build the road, control it, and own it for the national uses it is wanted to serve.

This is no subsidy, only a loan secured by ample pledge, say gentlemen. Ah, sir, be not beguiled by these pleasant illusions. I feel forewarned by an experience that cost on a theater of local fame. Massachusetts once lent her credit to a railroad corporation of great promise and mean performance. The argument was as plausible and as deceptive as the one urged here, and supported by as clear demonstration that the loan was a safe one and the State certain to realize commercial benefits of great value. Wheedled by the specious plea, the generous old Commonwealth lent her treasure to the enrichment of knaves and the shame of her commercial honor. How has it been on the larger field? Has the General Government ever touched the unclean thing without defilement? Is there a single instance where its bounty has not been abused to selfish ends? To this subsidy policy we must charge the grossest scandals that cloud our public life. I beg gentlemen to ponder the history of the several Pacific railroad corporations recorded to our perpetual shame in the official archives of Congress and familiar to all the land, and be admonished. The tree of subsidy has borne its natural fruit of corruption and profligacy. We should strike the ax at the root. When one of these corporations gets in position to lean on the arm of the Government and draw sustenance from the public purse, it seems in the loss of self-dependence to part also with thrift, and the spirit of plunder casts out the spirit of integrity. The Pacific Railroad cost indefinite millions more than it would have cost had the managers of its construction handled the funds alone of themselves and associate corporators. Who pays the wasteful excess? Credit-built railroads, especially when Government supplies the credit, are expensive beyond reasonable limit. And all the waste and debt constitute a drain and mortgage upon the commerce of the people. What a railroad can transport passengers and freight for, or in other words the tariff of tolls, depends on the capital invested in it and the liabilities to be met from its income. The greater the cost, as represented in stock or debt, the higher the tolls. We are a good deal perplexed to attain the lowest scale of costs in transportation of our products both to home and foreign markets. The importance to our commercial interests of lowest possible schedules of fares and freights is scarcely capable of overestimation. But how can we hope for cheap tolls from dear railroads? Is it wise to build any more such? The Union Pacific line is unable to properly serve the public. It levies unfair and extreme burdens of tribute upon the people and commerce of the country in the shape of fares, freights, and tolls on its traffic, fixed to a scale high enough to produce a revenue adequate to the payment of dividends on a fraudulent capital stock and the principal and interest of an indebtedness which represents waste, extravagance, and peculation. Practically it is a spoliation of the people by contributions laid on their commercial transactions. I would state the proposition thus: First, the common interest asks that railroads, which constitute so important an agent in commercial intercourse, be built at the least cost, to the end that the exchanges of commodities may be the more cheaply made; and, second, railroads built with Government aid cost dear, and therefore, except under extraordinary conditions, are not commercially desirable.

Gentlemen earnestly disavow that they solicit a subsidy. All they ask, they affirm, is that the Government shall guarantee the bonds of the corporation. Well, sir, be it gift, loan, or indorsement, it is all one in principle and the objection the same. The Government involves its credit and exposes itself to liability. Upon failure of the company to pay the interest on the bonds, the Government must pay it. But, the reply is, the company will not fail. Ah! sir, we cannot know that! Still, the reply is urged, suppose the company should fail, the Government can take possession of the road property and secure itself. But, sir, that is an entanglement that the Government should studiously avoid the danger of. A bankrupt railroad on the hands of the Government would be a most awkward sort of elephant, and suggests a contingency not to be contemplated with composure.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] demonstrates, as he claims, beyond contest, that the security the road offers is such that the Government is made absolutely safe in its indorsement. "The road," he asserts, in its incomplete condition, "as now operated, pays a fine profit," and "when completed it will be the best-paying road in the United States." To the same purport argues and asserts the gentleman from Tennessee. Sir, these advocates prove too much for their cause. If all these favorable conditions exist this corporation, regally endowed as it already is by Federal and State grants, ought not to be here a beggar for more help. The proper appeal is to the private capital of the country now idle and awaiting investment. Let the friends of the enterprise convince our vigilant capitalists of the correctness of their estimate of its eligibility, and abundant resources will come at their call. But, sir, the Congress of the United States ought not to embark the national finances in a venture which the sagacious men who control capital and credit hold aloof from.

Not only do I deny that Government can be justified on any grounds of public policy in aiding this particular railroad in any form, but I hold the opinion that no occasion has arisen in our history when it was wise for the Government by its credits, loans, or subsidies to aid railroad construction by private corporations. The transcontinental railway line to the Pacific, now in operation, had grave political considerations in its favor, growing out of the condition of the country at the time of its conception, of great force and persuasiveness, that do not exist in favor of this or any other proposed line. First, the difficulty of communication and commercial intercourse with our Pacific possessions was suggestive of peril to our territorial integrity in the not remote future, and to bind them more securely to us by closer commercial ties was obviously, at that juncture, a wise aim of statesmanship; and, second, the enterprise was felt to be beyond the then capacity of private capital to manage. And yet, sir, in view of all the facts and consequences attendant upon it, its enormous cost far in excess of all honest expenditure, the public treasure misapplied to the uses of peculation, and the mischiefs done to public morals, I am far from persuaded that the common welfare has been promoted by its construction in the manner it was. The country has been forced of late to a conviction of the impolicy of the construction of railroads in advance of commercial necessities. We, as a people, have unprofitably invested labor, materials, and capital, withdrawn from productive enterprise, in railroad building far beyond the natural wants and wholesome growth of our legitimate commerce, and to that extent have impaired our available industrial resources. As the unhappy result, and without proportionate benefits, we have saddled the industry of the people with huge public debts, national, State, and municipal, that stand for monuments to other generations of the improvidence of our railroad-mad age. We have attempted a too precipitate industrial conquest of the continent, as though our generation was the last of the race, and the whole continental resources were designed by the Creator for our use and essential to our happiness, and, but for our use, would go to waste in the workshop of the universe.

Sir, I do homage to the spirit of enterprise. But I do not agree that our commercial development, in the direction under discussion, has needed or now needs the stimulation of government subsidies. It is my belief that had we been content to go slower in the past we had gone surer and built wiser, and our industrial life to-day had been healthier, and our public life purer. My creed is simple and brief told, and fully covers the present case. It is, that capital is sagacious, more so in business affairs than Congress; that commerce is keen-sighted as the lynx to see and estimate its wants; that commerce and capital are at one in interest, and capital will lend itself to the active uses of commerce as largely as may consist with sound commercial growth; and finally and conclusively, that the province of the political establishment in relation to this branch of commerce extends no further than the enactment of just laws and the enforcement of efficient, frugal and honest government. I do not controvert what the gentleman from Tennessee elaborates in this connection on the subject of State rights. His reflections are in the main just and liberal, and quite significant of the clear sight that comes, after the secession madness, to men of sense. We are many States, but one nation, and while we keep inviolate the rights of the several States, we concede to the Federal agent all powers needful to support in vigorous health the welfare and dignity of the nation. No, sir; the State-rights doctrine (and I am its faithful disciple) has no application here. It is the broad question of the true limits and rightful reach of the government function, independent of the form of the political organization, whether federative or purely national, democratic or autocratic. I deprecate the policy of governmental aid to railroad corporations on the part of the State government as strenuously as on the part of the Federal Government, and I have been constant in this opinion and action whenever I have spoken or acted in relation thereto in the affairs of my own State. While I have seen much to confirm, I have seen nothing as yet in my experience to shake my convictions in this regard.

From these more general views I pass to consider other persuasions outside the general question that gentlemen urge upon us with zeal and eloquence, which do not reach the judgment though they may touch the sensibilities. We are implored in patriotic kinship to grant this as a measure of relief to the broken, maimed, and impoverished South. And again, it is demanded, in fair dealing's name, as an act of justice to the South, to equalize her portion of Federal favors with the portions granted to other sections of the Union. I wish to examine this claim upon our magnanimity and upon our justice, and ascertain what, if anything, is due of the one or the other or both.

Sir, I bear a warm heart for the people of the South, as warm as for any portion of my countrymen. I would not prefer over them even the chosen of my affection, the people of the State of my cradle, home, and expectant tomb, in rights, dignity, and honor. Nor would I consciously permit my lips to utter of them a word of reproach or crimination here in this council chamber of the Republic, whence all distinctions of fought out controversies are banished, and where all are clothed with equal dignity and speak with equal voice. For the rape of their peace and dignity, and the pillage of their substance by the adventurer, the politician, and the fanatic, I stint not of indignation. But I cannot admit the charge that the Federal Government has been unjust to the South and partial to the North and West in the carrying on of internal improvements, and I repel the aspersion as wholly groundless. Sir, so far as the Republic ever felt the domination of a section, the South dominated it by its intellectual skill and concentration of purpose until under a mad impulse of passion it broke the scepter of its rule. Up to 1860 no legislation was accomplished except it had southern countenance, and the charge of favoritism to northern interests prior to that date certainly will not lie. The memory of the southern statesmen of the ante bellum period cannot be successfully assailed with accusations of unthrifty care for the rights of their immediate section, or of prodigal liberality to the sister States of the Union while power dwelt in their hands.

How has it been since? Certain impediments, not useful to recapitulate, (the history is too fresh and too painful,) forbade the prosecution by the Federal Government of public works of a peaceful sort in the Southern States from 1860 to 1866. Our expenditure during that period, however—made on their account—amounting to some $5,000,000,000, sufficiently refutes all charges of Federal indifference or neglect. Their waywardness, sir, cost the Government an amount of treasure sufficient to have wrought for them their proportionate share of internal improvements for a thousand years and more! When the Government in 1862 resolved to unite more firmly, commercially and politically, its eastern and western possessions by a system of railroad communications, the location was prescribed by conditions beyond Government control. The line as established, it is urged, is too far north to best and most fairly serve the general interests of the whole country. Possibly—but the Government was not in fault; it but yielded to the inexorable conditions of the case—conditions for whose existence the South was responsible. This, be it borne faithfully in memory, was in 1862, when the wisest of our seers could not foretell the event of the conflict that was to cast the political configuration of a continent. National dismemberment was a contingency which even brave men, constant in faith and strong in hope, had to contemplate as a possible event. If secession triumphs, where will the national boundaries be? What will be done with the public domain outside of the established States' limits? What other secessions may follow?

These were grave and anxious questions, that haunted the vigils of statesmen of that fateful time. Obviously it was statesmanlike forecast to make all possible preparation to secure the best of the worst that might transpire, by strengthening the bonds of interest and attachment that held together the integral parts of the Union yet loyally steadfast to its authority, and so limit the area of secession. The Pacific slope, imperial in extent and resources, fitted by geographical situation to be the seat of an independent empire, was true to the Union. But the secession accomplished, disintegration in progress, would the Pacific States hold to their allegiance? They were remote, isolated by great mountain ranges and vast stretches of wilderness from the parent state. Was it not, then, a reasonable apprehension that if the principal political body violently broke apart, dwindling the majestic front of union and maiming the national sentiment, these distant members, unless brought into closer neighborhood and intimacies of commerce, would grow dissatisfied with a political relation in which their position was essentially provincial and aspire to independent statehood?

I thus, Mr. Speaker, indicate in broad lines the grave public considerations which operated to persuade the Government into its liberal action in aid of the construction of the Pacific Railroad, built as a war measure upon a political exigency. Of the location, in respect to latitude and relative position to the nation commercially and territorially, it should suffice to silence all objectors, especially from the southern quarter, that the route was fixed by the logic of the military situation created by secession. Should we have built it through a region of country contended for by hostile armies, and which the violence of war might in the final issue wrench from our dominion altogether? For reasons therefore which vitally affected the common welfare, and as a provision of national safety, the country lent its strength to forge this link of iron to the Union chain. There was no sectionalism in it. It was broadly national in aim and consequence. To treat it as a sectional measure laden with sectional benefits to the North, to be in justice compensated for upon some principle of sectional equivalents by Government support of a similar enterprise for the benefit of southern interests, would be to blink history and common sense, and to wrest truth and right reason to frame a false precedent.

Two exhibits are set out to sustain the charge of invidious favor to the North and West and neglect of the South in Federal benefactions. First is a statement of amounts expended by the United States for the various public works of the Government in each State and Territory of the Union from 1865 to 1873, whence it appears that out of a total of $103,294,501 but $11,612,086 was expended within the sixteen Southern and border States. Second, a statement showing that of $104,705,163 of Federal expenditures from 1783 to 1873 for railroads, canals, and wagon-roads, $6,981,982 only was expended in the Southern States. Pointing at these figures with the air of a man who feels and invokes indignation for the injustice they disclose, the gentleman from Tennessee exclaims:

> With this record, Mr. Chairman, staring gentlemen in the face, I most respectfully submit, is it fair-play? Is it generous? Nay, sir, is it just that these neglected portions of the Union should be refused the aid asked for?

Mr. Chairman, the most superficial reflection will, I think, show to the unprejudiced how incapable these figures are of the logical use the gentleman attempts to put them to. His palpable fallacy is the assumption that expenditures for public works located within a State are expenditures for the benefit of that State, and not, as the truth is, for national uses, and so for the joint benefit of all States and sections. For what, sir, were these "public works" expenditures within the past decade? More than $14,000,000 were spent within the District of Columbia for the accommodation of the business of the Federal Government—its legislation, its Executive Departments, the residence of the Chief Magistrate. Shall, therefore, Texas or Massachusetts or any other State conceive a grievance and put in a complaint that the District of Columbia has had more than its portion of the Federal expenditures, and therefore, to equalize matters, demand that the Government forthwith spend a share of public money within its borders?

Then, sir, a principal class of public works are on our navigable rivers, lakes, and harbors for the safety and convenience of our commerce; custom-house establishments at the gates of the commercial highways to gather in the tolls that fill the common purse; navy-yards to prepare armaments for the common defense, and fortifications for the protection of vulnerable points in the event of war. All expenditure for these works by the Federal Government is made for the betterment of its own property and the execution of its powers. The harbors and navigable waters within its jurisdiction it controls and owns for the uses of the commerce of all its people. Its customs establishments are the instruments it employs to collect its revenues and support the common government. Its fortifications and navy-yard establishments are the means by which it executes its power and fulfills its obligation to provide for the common defense. These public works are carried on as the public interests call for, regardless of States or localities, and the suggestion of a sectional apportionment of this class of expenditures is inadmissible and absurd. Sir, if there are public works that a judicious regard for national interests requires should be prosecuted in the South, I am ready to vote the needful appropriations; but in that vote I should be influenced solely by the claim of national needs, and in no manner by considerations of favor or benefit to any State. I would vote for a custom-house at Memphis or at Boston, not because Tennessee wanted it or Massachusetts wanted it, but because the Federal Government wanted it for the proper administration of its revenue laws. And so in all Federal expenditure the decisive test should in all cases be "Is it for a Federal use?" If not, then it is not within the rightful power of a Federal Congress to authorize it. If ay, then within whatever State limits expended, it is for the common benefit of all the States. I am unable to see how money or credit given or lent to a corporation chartered to build, own, and operate a railroad can, in any just sense, in any constitutional sense, be considered as applied to a Federal use.

One word of comment, sir, on the statement submitted of expenditures for railroads, canals, and wagon-roads, and the wholly impertinent inference sought to be deduced from it. I quote the eloquent remarks with which the gentleman from Tennessee supplements his tabulated exhibit:

> Here, sir, is the large sum of $104,705,163.43 that Congress has appropriated from 1789 down to 1873 for railroads, canals, and wagon-roads, of which sum the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee, twelve in number, have received $3,246,861.56, while the other States have received $101,458,501.87. These States contain 812,499 square miles, while the other twenty-six States contain 1,075,854 square miles only. Of this pittance West Virginia gets not a dollar; Texas not a dollar; Georgia, one of the original thirteen, gets not a dollar; South Carolina, another one of the old thirteen, gets only $9,961.92; Tennessee received only $5,000, and would not have got that but for the brave volunteers who followed the flag of the Union borne by her illustrious Jackson through the forests and swamps of the Southwest to drive back the savages and to aid in conquering a peace with the haughty Britons upon the victorious plains of New Orleans.
> Virginia, the cradle of the Revolution, the mother of the statesmen and heroes whom American patriotism will forever delight to honor, who in the prodigality of her generosity consecrated to freedom an empire, has received of this meager sum $57,538.27. And now, when the voice of Old Virginia is heard upon this floor pleading her own and the cause of her neglected sisters, it is stifled in the cry of subsidy that hoarsely murmurs through this Hall.

This is eloquence, but nothing more. His tabular exhibit flatly contradicts his oratory both in fact and logic. From that it appears that more than four-fifths of the whole amount, to wit, $85,000,000, was expended in the common territories of the Union! Of the portion spent within the orginal States, the southern and border got the chief part. "Virginia," exclaims the gentleman, "the cradle of the Revolution * * * has received of this the meager sum of $57,538.27!" Well, sir, Massachusetts, who, too, had a cradle of her own, and rocked in it the lovely twin infants, Revolution and Liberty, as tenderly and as bravely as did old Virginia, never got a dollar, and she neither complains nor feels herself a "neglected sister" in consequence. No portion was spent in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, or Connecticut, of the "old thirteen," and only $3,500—a sixteenth of what Virginia got—in New York, the Empire State of the Union. The gentleman's inference is not deducible from his facts. He must seek other cause of complaint or yield his argument.

Mr. Chairman, national thrift is the proper study of our statesmen. Our national housekeeping must be conformed to rigid economical rules and within our income. Weakened by the enormous waste and cost of war, burdened with a debt the annual interest on which is nearly or quite double the total annual ordinary expenses of carrying on the Government before the war, our industries languishing and our revenues falling off, the nation is severely admonished to the most frugal husbandry of its resources in order to be honest with its creditors and just to its people. Sir, if the time ever was, which I dispute, when it was wisdom to suckle at the Government bosom enterprises like this Texas Pacific, it is not now when the industry of the country bends nigh to break under a taxation that, burdensome as it is, barely suffices to produce revenue equal to the indispensable needs of Government. The exigencies of the financial status put bonds upon our liberal soul. We must yield to the inexorable fact of our necessity, and hold back the munificent with the frugal hand; for, let gentlemen argue and asseverate as they will, the measure means fresh taxes and burdens for the people.

None can have a readier sympathy than I feel for the South in the disasters that have befallen her. I shall rejoice with her people to see the fires of a prosperous content bright as of old on her renewed altars. But what she suffers is the judgment entered against her on the decision from which lies no appeal in the litigation she invoked in the tremendous court of arms. Aid is asked from the Federal Government for her recuperation. I fear she mistakes the source whence her deliverance is to come, if come it shall. It is the cry to Hercules without the brave and patient self-helpfulness which is always the condition of Hercules's help. This railroad is by no means an indispensable factor in her recuperation; certainly not the chiefest or among the chief. She is not condemned to pine in commercial seclusion. With her incomparable Mississippi and grand coast line of sea and gulf, the best markets of the world are as accessible to her as is possible to be. She has no occasion to traverse the continent in vain quest of El Dorados. Let her cease to cast wistful eyes abroad and look at home. No "argosies of magic sails" will bring unearned treasures to her. No wizard touch will bid her fallen temples rise and her wasted fields be clothed in riches. The shapely form of her regenerate prosperity must be reared, if at all, by the industrious hands of her thrifty people, and its foundations be set in her abundant soil.

Mr. HOOKER. I know, Mr. Chairman, how difficult it is on a topic which is not immediately before the House to command its attention; and indeed I am somewhat averse ever to speak in this House upon any question except the particular matter which may be under consideration. But I will avail myself of the latitude of debate which is allowed in Committee of the Whole upon any proposition which may be under consideration to correct some views and opinions which have been expressed in the public press and elsewhere in regard to a question upon which it was my purpose to address some remarks to the House when the committee charged with the investigation of the affairs of the Freedman's Bank and Trust Company, of which my friend, Judge DOUGLAS, of Virginia, is the chairman, should have made its report. I do it now because I think it improbable that that report will be made at an early day; and in order to correct some erroneous impressions which have been made by the testimony taken before the committee which has been organized by the co-ordinate branch of the national Legislature, and which is now in session in the capital of my own State. And I do it, sir, because I think that the truth of history needs vindication, and that the people whom I have the honor to represent here in connection with my colleagues have not been understood in reference to this matter.

It was a very difficult question to determine, Mr. Chairman, when the war closed what should be the relation, the natural, normal, and necessary relation, between those of the Southern States who had without any wish, or will, or thought, or fault certainly of their own been born masters, and those who equally without any wish, or will, or thought, or fault of their own had been born slaves. The result of the civil contest changed as it were in the twinkling of an eye the relations borne between 4,000,000 of people in the South to the Caucasian race that had inhabited it from the days of the Revolution down to the present time. And it is no wonder, sir, that whenever that condition of affairs had arisen in any State—from Massachusetts, which was the first to manumit the slaves, down to New Jersey, which was the last to manumit under an apprentice system—I say that it is no wonder when this condition of affairs sprung up in each State that the legislators and the statesmen of those States felt that they had to deal with a question difficult of solution and proper adjustment. There has been partly revealed through the public press the evidence taken before this committee, a committee by the by, Mr. Chairman, most extraordinarily constituted—constituted by one department of the Legislature, not a joint committee of this House and the Senate, but a committee of the Senate, proposing to sit in judgment upon the action of a sovereign State as to the election of its Legislature and its public officers; and even further, Mr. Chairman, in violation of a right inherent in this House, and which until the resolution appointing that committee was presented to the other branch of the national Legislature had never been questioned, that each House was the judge of the qualifications of its own members.

There have been many strains upon the Constitution within the last fifteen years. There have been many infractions of its provisions. But it was left, sir, to the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress to present to the country the strange and startling proposition that the Senate possessed the power to constitute a committee to determine the competency of the elections of the sitting members of this House. Suppose we should reverse the picture, Mr. Chairman, and constitute a committee of the House of Representatives to ascertain whether the Senator from Delaware or the Senator from Indiana had his seat properly in the other branch of the Legislature. It is not a more startling proposition, so far as constitutional infraction is concerned, than is that which was embraced in the resolution under which this committee is now sitting at the capital of my own State.

But the public mind had probably been prepared for measures as extreme as this. It had been prepared for them because there had been a strain upon the Constitution, not in the interests of the country and of peace and of order, but that strain upon the Constitution had been in the interest of party for the domination of party; and the appeals that were made in order to secure these infractions were made, not that peace and law and order and the attendant prosperity which go along with them should be the legitimate inheritance of the country after ten years had elapsed since the close of the war, but they were made in order that there might be continued the domination of the party in power.

When the proposition was first presented to the consideration of the country as to what should be the status of the colored race who had been freed by the results of the war, and who stood at its conclusion by the adoption of the amendments to the Constitution upon the same plane of civil rights and equality before the law—when that question was first presented there was much debate as to what was the proper course to be pursued. A distinguished gentleman from one of the Western States made the proposition, as was charged, in a debate in 1871 between Governor STEVENSON, of Kentucky, and himself, that it was necessary that a period of probation of from seven to ten years should be allowed in order to qualify the colored man for the intelligent exercise of the suffrage. That proposition was charged, I say, in that discussion between the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Kentucky, in 1871, as the reports will show. Such a proposition, however, never came from any Southern State. On the contrary, there was no disposition on the part of any Southern State, so far as I am aware, to deny the legitimate results of the war and the bestowal of citizenship and the right of the ballot on the colored race. It is true that many of us doubted, and the most sagacious men of the republican party doubted whether they were prepared to emerge at once from a condition of slavery without intelligence to a condition of freedom and the exercise intelligently of the ballot. But such was the will of the nation, and more, such was the will of all of the Southern States. Mississippi adopted it by her own ordinance.

They have, then, given the colored man the ballot ever since the war closed, during the last ten years; and I predicted in Mississippi last fall that the first proposition which would be made to the country to take that ballot from him or to limit its exercise would spring not from the Southern States, but would spring from the republican party who had already given the power of the ballot to 800,000 citizens, and thus increased to that extent the ratio of representation in this Hall and the power of the Southern States in the electoral college.

I had scarcely taken my seat upon this floor when a message from the President came to this body and the Senate, recommending among other measures that all persons who could not read and write in 1890 should be deprived of the ballot, coupled, it is true, with a sickly proviso that it should not apply to any one whose illiteracy now disqualifies him. But, sir, that was a verification of the prediction I had made, that so far from any southern State proposing to restrict, limit, or take away the ballot from the colored race, the proposition came in the shape of a recommendation from the President of the United States himself, for no man can conceal from himself that that was the class of people in reference to whom the recommendation was designed and intended to apply. What I have just said is sustained by a debate which occurred in this House during the last session of Congress, when I was not here, when the force bill was introduced and members in this Hall and in the Senate were appealed to by every sentiment of party pride and every incentive to the accumulation of party power to sustain that measure ten years after the war had closed. The organ of the Administration, the organ of the President, the organ of the republican party then and now in this city, asserted that the passage of that measure, which was designed to restore military power in the South and military commissions to try questions of civil right, was necessary, not in the interest of peace and order, but in the interest of the republican party. That sentiment resulted in words which I will read in a moment, in a speech made on the 27th of February, not by a democrat, but by a republican then and now. But when that measure was before Congress, feeling that there were certain great principles of American freedom,

American liberty, and human freedom, and human rights the world over that were dearer than party ties, and which constitutions and governments were simply designed to be the exponents and protectors of, a gentleman who then held his place on this floor, as distinguished in his advocacy of the republican party as any man, used these remarkable words in relation to it, and I allude to Mr. Hawley, of Connecticut. When that bill (the force bill) was under consideration he described his own partisan position, and said:

I have been a radical abolitionist from my earliest days. I began on reaching my majority as a member of the free-soil party. I fought in it with all my might until the republican party was formed, and I joined that party. I went into the service of the Union the first day of the war, and I staid in it until I was honorably discharged after the close. I have worked with the republican party for its most radical measures, the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteen amendments included. So my record on that subject is tolerably clear and radical.

But I am coming to a time now when I must seriously consider whether I shall go on with some of my radical associates. I am compelled in a measure to part company with them, but I dislike to do it. A very few minutes will suffice to tell why I must take another path this once. I cannot agree to put any further or greater powers into the hands of any President of the United States. I think the existing laws upon the statute-book are strong enough for the preservation of all the rights guaranteed by the Federal Government, full and strong enough for the fulfillment and discharge of all the obligations resting upon that Government.

This is the evidence offered by a republican, and in addition to that, on that very morning the organ of the Administration and of the republican party said in reference to this force bill, which drove Mr. Hawley from the ranks of his own party, radical as he was, that—is required to preserve to the republican party the electoral vote of the Southern States.

The passage of the bill—

Alluding to the force bill—

Remember that if the democrats carry all the Southern States, as they will if the White League usurpation in some of them is not suppressed, it will require only fifty democratic electoral votes from the Northern States to elect a democratic President. This is a liberal estimate.

The evidence, then, is that that measure was inaugurated and designed not for the interests of the country, not because it was required to restore peace and order, but it was done in order that the Southern States might be held in the leash of party, for party purposes, and for party domination.

Now, sir, I have said that you have given the ballot to the colored people during the first ten years after the war; you did it by amendments to the Constitution, and many of the States did it themselves. You have given them the ballot for ten years, and while in all the Southern States they are banded together as sheep in the shambles or as cattle on the way to market, they have voted en masse in favor of the republican party, and so long as this could be done, so long as the colored vote could be utilized in favor of the republican party, you heard no proposition, either from the President or from anybody else, to limit his exercise of the ballot. But for one, representing a large portion of these colored people in my district, and as standing here pledged to see that all their rights under the Constitution and under the ordinance of the convention of my State are sustained, I here enter my protest against any effort to limit the power and authority which you have already given to them, and a power and authority which you have given to the Southern States by extending the ratio of representation. These rights were maintained so long as they could be utilized, so long as carpet-baggers could control them—a class of men who came to our country for the purpose of running the State governments, and who are very pertinently described by that good and philosophic man Mr. Greeley, when he had been to Texas to tell the people there "what he knew about farming." When he returned to New York they asked him the question if what was reported about the carpet-bagger was true. His response was, "Yes, gentlemen, I regret to say to you that he is a mournful fact, and the attitude in which I have most generally found him is with both arms around the negro's neck and both hands in his pocket." [Laughter.]

It is this class of men who were sent there, or who went there for the purpose of organizing the State governments. As I have had occasion to say elsewhere, if the terms of the surrender made by your great battling generals had been carried out in good faith, if a set of politicians had not crept into the halls of the national Legislature and into the halls of the State Legislatures who believe in laws engendered in hate, you could have restored real peace, and the prosperity which goes with it would have been established in those States long ago. But this class of men were sent there. I do not speak my own opinion or speak from the stand-point of any democrat. On the contrary, there sits upon this floor a gentleman whom I regret is not now in his seat, who at the time the debate was going on gave a description of the governments of the Southern States from a republican stand-point. I allude to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] He gave a description, not exactly as terse and dramatic as that which Mr. Greeley gave, but generally as truthful as that, and here is what he said in the last Congress:

For the last few years the infamy and disgrace of certain southern state governments have been constantly on the increase. There have been corrupt electors and corrupt elections. There have been corrupt legislators and corrupt legislation. There have been double Legislatures, double governors, double Representatives in this House, and double Senators year by year in many States. There have been bad men in these States who have bought power by wholesale bribery and have enriched themselves at the expense of the people by peculation or open-handed robbery. Corruption and anarchy have occupied and possessed these unfortunate States.

Now that is the evidence of a republican as to the character of the governments which had grown up under the carpet-bag administrations in the South. That is the evidence of a gentleman identified in all his political relations with the republican party, and yet at that time it was not considered necessary that either branch of the Legislature should send forth a committee for the purpose of investigating that very corruption which was admitted by a prominent republican member of the House then to exist in the Southern States. But now that the colored man has for ten years exercised the right of the ballot; now that the colored man begins to understand that there is an identity of interest between himself and the white race of the country; now that they understand that when I come here if I make good laws for the white man I must make good laws for the black man, and when I make bad laws for the white man I make bad for the black man; now that they are beginning, in obedience to the great mandate of the Master of the universe, to earn their bread by the sweat of their face; now that there is quiet and peace, and that the natural relations between labor and capital are established, the proposition comes from a republican President that he ought to be in some way deprived of his ballot. I enter my pro'est against it. He is now beginning to be instructed that there is no power in the Federal Government to maintain the four millions of his race. He is beginning to be convinced of the fact that he must work for his support and that of his family, and when he does that he knows that the land he cultivates, the animals he plows his land with, the meat and bread that keep body and soul together, are solely derived from the southern people, and the southern man has been his real friend, has understood his character, his necessities, and wants more than any northern man, be he a democrat or a republican. I enter my protest against his advancement in physical well-being being made a political question; it is not so, and should not be made so.

In 1875, when the election occurred in my State, the platform adopted by the democratic and conservative party declared for perfect equality before the law in every particular. It has been alleged that in that election the colored man did not act freely of his own accord with the democratic party. There was but one general officer voted for in that election, and he to fill a vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the treasurer of the State, and the conservative candidate was elected by 33,000 majority; in almost every congressional district the conservative majorities were very large, but there are two congressional districts which have sent republican members to this House, and one of them owes his election and holds his seat by virtue of the fact that every democrat in his district voted for him, and while they sit here they are living refutations of the slander which is attempted to be put upon the white people of the State, that they banded together to prevent republicans from being elected to the Halls of Congress.

I say that this could not have occurred if the accusations made were true. If the power to carry it out exists in one congressional district it is as emphatic in another. No such state of things exists; on the contrary, I remember very well that on the 27th of October, 1875, when the conservative and democratic party held its convention and gathered at the capitol, where Governor Ames filled the executive office, there were present there from the county of Hinds, the largest tax-paying county in the State before the war, and probably containing more colored people than any other county in the State, a procession of colored men from that county who passed along before the capitol. One of the judges of the supreme court of the State stood by me on the pavement and saw the colored men riding through the capital with the democratic and conservative banners borne by them, and he then said to me, what the election proved to be true, that the back-bone of the republican party in Mississippi was broken. The result was that in the county of Hinds, the capital county, the county where Mr. Ames has his official office, where the United States marshal holds his official position, the county where the United States court is held and appoints the supervisors of election, a county which usually gives 2,500 republican majority, was carried by the democrats by 1,580.

And who were the men elected? Prominent among the men who, sacrificing personal interest and private gain, stood forward bearing the banner of that party, was that distinguished veteran in the whig ranks who all his life had been a whig, Hon. Amos R. Jackson, and side by side with him stood George W. Harper and Oliver Clifton and Mayer Dewdney, all their lives old-line whigs. Everywhere throughout the State former party distinctions and political differences were merged in the common desire, and I may say in the common determination, that these corrupt governments such as Mr. HALE described as having existed in Mississippi, and which had swelled its governmental expenses from $360,000 to over $1,250,000 annually, should cease to exist.

I take this county as one just and proper to be taken as an evidence of what was done. I assert the fact, and it cannot be contradicted, that in the lower part of that county the colored men not only voted the democratic ticket, but they united in the formation of a club, and came over to the conservative party almost en masse, not because force or intimidation or fraud was applied to them, but because they became satisfied that the promises which the republican party had been making to them so long; promises which had been made to the ear but broken to the hope; promises which the Government had not the power to fulfill much less they; promises which included the idea that some extraordinary advantage should be given to the colored men over other people, and which, of course, they had not the power to carry out, the promise, for instance, of forty acres of land and a mule to each one of them—they became satisfied that these promises were all delusive; and of their own accord and voluntarily they entered into that canvass and cast their ballots side by side with the old white people of the country, satisfied that there was a common destiny for them all, and that what was for the prosperity of the one was for the prosperity of the other.

It has been said that fraud and force and intimidation existed in that State during that canvass. Sir, in the district which I have the honor to represent there was but one county that cast its votes against me; and there was one county that gave me every vote within it except two, though there were probably a great many colored men in that county.

There was one county lying on the banks of the Mississippi River which I visited. It was very largely a colored county. I addressed a mixed auditory of white and colored people in the day-time. At night I retired to the residence of a friend some distance from the village, with no expectation of speaking again. That night there was an organization of colored men of that neighborhood, the president of the organization being a colored man; and to my surprise, as I was about preparing to retire, a committee of colored men waited upon me and asked me to address that audience of colored men. I present this fact to the House and to the country as an evidence that the assertion is not true, but is a libel upon both races, that we have hostile feelings one toward the other.

It has been sometimes said that the white people of the Southern States were particularly hostile not only to the colored man, but also to the white men of the republican party who came down there for the purpose of taking part in our election. Well, sir, I can only say that we have in Mississippi a record upon that subject of which we are not ashamed. In the days of our prosperity, in the days when we were a power in the land, in the days when our people were wealthy, who of all the men of Mississippi received the highest honors and distinction of our people? I call to mind just now that grand old man John Anthony Quitman, who came from the Knickerbocker region of New York and settled among us years ago. He was advanced to the highest positions in our State—of chancelor, of governor, and finally of Representative upon this floor. He was a northern man.

I call to mind that gallant old veteran, Charles Clark, yet living and hobbling about on his crutches. He came from the banks of the beautiful Ohio.

I call to mind that great and gifted genius who came from away off down on the eastern shore of Maine, the gallant, eloquent, and noble Prentiss, who came as came those others and hundreds like them honestly to lend their bone and sinew and muscle and blood and brain to build up the waste-places of our country, and to become in deed and in truth part and parcel of us. Whenever men have come there for that purpose, with those objects, whether from the East or from the West, they have ever been met with warm hearts and open arms.

But when a certain class of men have come down there, and instead of ringing the front-door bell have stolen in at the kitchen door and attempted to breed bad blood (and there are yet those who would do it) between the old white people of the country and the old slaves, now freedmen—when they come with this purpose and insidiously endeavor to instill into the minds and hearts of the colored people hostility and opposition to the whites, I say now as I have said upon the soil of Mississippi, "The back of our hands to this class of people forever," and our people say so.

I may refer as an illustration, and I take him as I took the county of Hinds as the best illustration, I refer to a distinguished general who recently has been governor of that State; he came there a military man. When you sent your committee down to investigate certain disturbances, for which in the sight of man and God he was probably more responsible than any other living man, when you sent your committee there for the purpose of making an investigation, I chanced for the first time to see him.

The inquiry was made of him, "Governor Ames, when did you first determine to settle in Mississippi?" His reply was, "November, 1869." "When were you elected United States Senator?" His reply was, "In 1870—about January or February." The third inquiry was, "Who signed your credentials?" The reply was, "I signed them myself." [Laughter.]

Mr. COOK. And his colleague told him that he had not lived long enough in the State to get his shirt washed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOOKER. He came, however, to the United States Senate, a body for which, Mr. Chairman, since I first read the memorable lines of Mr. Calhoun in speaking of it, I have entertained the profoundest respect and regard. For Mr. Calhoun said "that it was the favorite of the Constitution," where Delaware, with her 80,000 inhabitants, stood upon an equality with New York, with her 4,000,000. Ay, and more; that upon a proposition to change the equality of sovereign representation in the Senate, Delaware, the smallest State in the Union, with but one Representative upon this floor and two Senators in the other branch, Delaware had the power and the right and the authority under the Constitution to put her veto upon the acts of all the other people and all the other States.

He (Governor Ames) came to that body. I have always thought when one was advanced to the high dignity of representing a sovereign State he should rise to the level of the plane of the lofty duties which devolved upon him; that he should forget party and party spirit; that he should forget there was a majority in his favor and a minority which voted against him. I hold to the doctrine, too, that is true of Representatives here, that a Representative when elected here, as a Senator when elected to the other branch of the national Legislature, should feel that he represented the whole people, the minority who did not think him fit for the position as well as the majority who elected him.

When this distinguished gentleman was advanced to this position, in a debate which occurred in 1871, he spoke the sentiments of the carpet-baggers of the South. When in the debate upon that occasion he stood upon the floor of the Senate, the question being the conferring of the franchise upon the colored men, he said, and I quote his precise language:

> It is to be desired that this question of negro suffrage shall not be settled by those who believe him unfit for citizenship and those who, as his masters, would have sold him to be cut up on the butcher's block had such a disposition of his body brought in a few more dollars.—Congressional Globe, first session Forty-second Congress, page 569.

That was the sentiment uttered by this chief of the carpet-baggers, and I have always replied to it by saying that the man whose heart could have conceived, or whose mind could have thought such a thought, or whose lips could have uttered it only proved that if he had been there himself he would have done what he suspected others capable of doing. I regret to say that that sentiment, which was a libel upon every southern white man whom he represented and whom he should have represented, for it embraced them all—I regret to say there was no Senator from Mississippi to rise on the floor of the Senate Chamber in vindication of the slandered honor and fair fame of that State. But I rejoice to say there was a Senator who, though probably he had never set his foot on Mississippi soil or upon Mississippi soil gazed into the face of a Mississippi man or a Mississippi woman, that there was a Senator there, large hearted and great minded, who rose in his place, although he came from the far-off State of Ohio, (I allude to the great-minded, catholic-spirited THURMAN, of Ohio)—I rejoice there was a Senator who did rise in his place and say:

> Now, sir, if you want the people of the South to be orderly, give them good government. Let them govern themselves according to the nature and spirit of our free institutions; let the intelligence of the country have fair play; let the honesty and economy that everybody will admit existed in those States before the civil war, whatever faults they may have had, once more take place; let mere adventurers retire to the background or hide themselves in the holes from which they came; let once more the people feel that they have a Constitution that will be enforced, laws that they repect; and once more you will have peace and order there as elsewhere.—Congressional Globe, Forty-second Congress, page 192.

That was the reply which had to be made by the Senator of a distant State in vindication of the white people of Mississippi against the slander charged upon them by their carpet-bag Senator.

But I now say, sir, that he who asserts, whether he be Governor Ames or anybody else, that there exists in the heart of that white people a disposition to deny the right of free suffrage to the colored man, and I say more, that he who asserts that the colored man, I mean the great body of the laboring colored men of the land, the bone, and sinew, and muscle that come into contact with the earth daily, and like Antæus, the famed wrestler of old, who gained new life and vigor every time he touched his mother earth—I allude to the great body of the laboring colored men in Mississippi—I say there is no hostility, there is no difference between them and the white people, and they are rapidly coming together, and it is the height of cruel barbarity to attempt by thrusting political differences between them to create anew dissensions which now, happily, are rapidly passing away.

It has been said, sir, that the colored race was true to the Union, that some of its men fought on the side of the Union. I am prepared to assert for the great body of that race that they had an ordeal presented to them, one never before presented, and it was this: We were battling for what they considered and what others considered to be their perpetual subjugation. The Union arms if successful would, as a necessary incident, free them. Yet, sir, the great body of the working colored race stood true and firm by the side of those with whom they had been reared, and upon whose places they had been born. They stood by us during the trials and tribulations and hardships and bloodshed of the long civil war. They stood by us when temptations of an extraordinary character were offered for their desertion. They stood by us when there was not a meal in the larder to be spread for the common family. They stood by us when the lambent flames of the incendiary licked our very house-tops and the crackling rafters crumbled into ashes upon our desolated hearth-stones. It is a slander upon that race to say they were false to the soil upon which they had been reared and false to the people with whose fortunes their own, whether for good or for ill, had constantly been blended.

That is their history during the war, and since it no dissension would have existed, no differences would have been created if they had been left alone to act for themselves, if they had been left free to make their own choice. But loyal leagues were formed, and it is a well-known fact in the history of the country that the reconstruction acts which have sometimes been so much lauded had only one particular and especial fault about them, and that was that they attempted to reconstruct a State and leave the people out. [Laughter.] All such reconstruction as that failed, and the very moment the mailed hand of the Government was taken off those States, the very moment the people were allowed to act freely for themselves, that very moment they asserted the right of local self-government, and the colored people united with the white people for the purpose of establishing it.

It has been sometimes said, sir, that it was necessary you should have the military in the Southern States. For myself, I have never had any particular reason to find fault with its existence there, for I have generally found them fair-minded in their action. In the city in which I live they are encamped upon my old homestead, and have been ever since the war closed. The gentlemen who is now commandant of the post there, Major Allyn, in the progress of the last campaign, having application made to him to loan a cannon to the rival political parties, did so to the republican party, and he did the same thing in the spirit of even-handed justice and generosity to the conservative-democratic party. For that act he was court-martialed and tried, but I am happy to say that the spirit of even-handed justice and fair-mindedness which he had displayed toward the people in the midst of whom he held military position was displayed by the commission which tried him, and he was acquitted. Who was the chief accuser? A man by the name of G. K. Chase, of New York, who was sent down by the Department of Justice, as he testified on the trial, for the purpose of acting as a secret agent in the supervision of the elections in the State of Mississippi. You had provided by an act of Congress for supervisors in the various congressional districts, and under that authority the district judge had appointed a general supervisor for the State, and the supervisor for the State had appointed supervisors for every congressional district. Yet his report to the Department of Justice has never been made public.

Not one single complaint has been made by any supervisor of any congressional elections throughout the length and breadth of Mississippi that there was unfairness in the election. Ay, and more than that, though we have a statute, simple and plain in its provisions, giving the remedy to any man who thinks he has been unjustly defrauded of his position to test that question primarily before a justice of the peace, and by appeal to the superior courts, there was not a contest there; from the highest general officer who was elected down to the constable, there was not a single contest throughout the length and breadth of the entire State, not one. Can it be said, therefore, there is any truth in the assertion that fraud, or force, or intimidation was exercised anywhere? On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, in the counties east of Pearl River there is not a republican, white or black, who will attempt to say there was anything like intimidation or fraud, not one. And, more than that, if you take every one of the counties in which there is the slightest allegation of any irregularities on the day of election, and you throw them out of the count, or give them the majority the republican party obtained at the previous election, it would not change the result.

I say, therefore, you have this spectacle presented in the face of the proof offered by Governor Ames and his coadjutors—you have the significant fact that there is not a single supervisor, though appointed by your district judge in every congressional district, who has reported any unfairness in a single contest anywhere. And yet you have the general assertion that fraud and force and violence were resorted to for the purpose of affecting the result. I think, sir, this is a sufficient answer to whatever evidence may be attempted to be given on this subject.

If let alone, sir, the relations, the natural relations between the colored man and the white man of the South will adjust themselves. I have said it is not a political question. I have said that you could not make it a political question; that you could not put upon the statute-book any law which would affect those relations; on the contrary, the two races must work out the relations which will exist between them for themselves. They are rapidly doing so. And it is just and due to the colored race to say that, taking them in the mass, uninfluenced by bad advisers, uncontrolled by men who think that the blood of twenty-five or thirty of them, in the language of Governor Ames, would be a service to the republican party—leaving them free from the influence of such men and such control, they are a peaceable, quiet, hard-working, industrious community. And so far from its being true that the old white people of the country are disposed to be oppressive to them in any particular, I can only say that in my own congressional district, and on my own farm where I have some that were formerly my slaves and some who were not, I never even mentioned to one of them privately that I was a candidate for Congress. And such I believe was the temper and disposition of other candidates everywhere. And never at any time did I make any speech in that or in any other canvass since they have been invested with the ballot by the Constitution of the United States; never have I said that they did not have as full, as free, as perfect, as unquestioned a right to vote against me as to vote for me. And so with all the other candidates.

When you take into consideration the fact that there never was a representative of that race in this body until after the war closed and these 800,000 freedmen had been made voters, you have presented a significant fact. If the republican party of the North, or any of the people of the North, whether republicans or democrats, had had this extraordinary regard for the interests and the welfare and the intelligence of the colored race, why was it never manifested long before the results of the war?

In Massachusetts the colored man has been a freedman for nearly a hundred years. State by State all the States of the North manumitted their slaves at successive periods, down to New Jersey, whose last act of manumission was in 1846, and that under the apprentice system which gave to the old owner the right to the possession of the services of the male under twenty-eight years and of the female until she was twenty-one years of age. In New Jersey, where I chanced at one time for some years to be myself, and in Massachusetts, where I chanced to be at one time for two years, I saw a great many intelligent colored men. In Massachusetts the white men stand to the colored men as a hundred to one, according to the census of 1870. In New Jersey, the last State to manumit, the white men stand to the colored men as forty-six and one-half to one. The colored man was unimportant in influence; he was greatly in the minority; and yet, in both of those States, in Massachusetts and New Jersey, I knew a great many intelligent, educated colored men. And it was the same in all the Northern States through which it was my fortune to travel, and yet, during my long residence in New Jersey and during my two years' residence in Cambridge, I never saw or heard of a colored man being a governor of one of those States, a representative in its Legislature, or presiding on its bench as a circuit judge or even as a justice of the peace. Why was this? Why did the country awake at once to the recognition of the fact that these people were a power in the land and that they had an intelligence which ought to be invoked in the interests of their own race? In no northern State, whether democratic or republican, did they ever attempt to send one colored man here as a Representative.

I say, therefore, that when this wonderfully aroused affection and regard for the colored man is assumed to be a virtue on the part of a particular party, the question arises how it never asserted itself before. And it is a striking refutation of the idea that there was any peculiar love or affection among northern men toward this race of people rather than among southern men. We had a very striking illustration of the force of this a short time after the war closed. I chanced to be traveling from the Mississippi River to my home, and I took my seat in a car in the vicinity of a good-looking gentleman and a still better-looking lady. In the progress of the journey to the capital we got into conversation, and the relations between the two races, their rights and interests and the duties of one toward the other, became the subject of conversation. He professed very great regard for the colored race; he manifested profound sensitiveness for their rights to be recognized in the Southern States, and as he conversed with me the lady who sat by his side, and who had been flashing her black, beautiful eyes on me occasionally, when his enthusiasm became very great, turned to me and with great emphasis, and with that power of expression which belongs to the female alone, and which is denied to our sex, said, "This gentleman is my husband, and so far from having such affection for the colored race as he professes, he is really prejudiced so bitterly against them that he will never allow me to employ one of them in our household even to wait upon us."

I assert here for my own State that in the coming election as in the past the democratic and conservative party, in the ranks of which I assert that there are to-day thousands of colored men as earnest, as warm, and as voluntary in their support of that party as any white man—I say in the coming election, as in the past, profoundly convinced that the great material interests of the country and the true prosperity of the races are so indissolubly united that you might as well undertake to sever a limb from the body or allow it to be attacked with gangrene and expect that the warm currents of blood would rush from the heart to the extremity and from the extremity back to the heart, as to suppose that this country can be in a healthy condition if there is a perpetual warfare kept up by designing politicians between the two races; but, if we are left alone and allowed to adjust the normal and legitimate relations between the races, I believe that peace will prevail within our borders, and with it that prosperity which once distinguished us as a nation.

I know of no man within the limits of my State who has expressed the wish to change the political condition of the colored race within my State in any respect. We have manifested this in the most extraordinary manner by the taxes we have submitted to for the purpose of educating our colored citizens. Are you aware of the fact that in many of the northern States when taxes were raised for school purposes the taxes were distributed to the colored persons in proportion to what they paid in taxes, but we in Mississippi have willingly allowed all our property to be taxed and that the colored people shall have an equal share in the establishment of common schools for the education of their children.

I have before me a synopsis of the laws passed in various northern States designed for the protection of those States against a class of people who might become a charge upon them.

I am indebted for this synopsis to the very intelligent chairman of the democratic committee of my State, General J. A. George, who made this synopsis to show what had been the temper and what the character of the laws passed in the Northern States at the time of the emancipation of their slaves.

It is said that the same force and fraud and intimidation existed in regard to the white republicans of the South. I do not like to refer to myself, but I may be permitted to say that I labored under the profound conviction to-day that in the interest of good government, and impelled by the necessity of having good government for our people, all the northern men, the republicans who have gone to our

State for the purpose of lending their energies and capital for the building up of our waste-places—that all the prominent republicans in my district gave me their votes for the position I hold upon this floor. Were they intimidated? Will any gentleman go to Mississippi and dare to say that they were? They stand there to-day desiring good government, preferring it to party, believing that good government is better than the domination of a party, and that we there labor under the same necessity which existed everywhere for letting the laboring-man alone, as was so strikingly illustrated by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in a debate in the last Congress. Speaking on the 27th of February, 1875, Judge KELLEY said:

> The falling off in the revenues demonstrates the poverty of the people. They do not contribute to the Treasury, because they cannot supply their wants. They are unable to consume dutiable and taxable commodities, because we have by our legislation paralyzed their productive power. It is a maxim of mine, and I cannot too often repeat it, that a prosperous people not only supply their wants but gratify their desires; while a people suffering as the laboring people of this country now are not only do not gratify their desires, but are unable to provide themselves with the necessaries of life.
> More than a million working people of the country are in want. In one week, ay, in the first five days of one week, it is recorded that forty-one sober, industrious, and honest workingmen in my own city begged the privilege of passing the winter in the house of correction rather than starve or steal.

This was the legitimate reaction from a system of laws which strains the Constitution; you cannot do it without a fearful reaction such as has been produced now, a reaction which to-day stretches over your broad and beautiful country of the North. We must have peace and order and good government, general as well as local. You must have confidence between man and man. You must have corruption ruled out of high places. You must have the miserable pretenders who have been sent into the Southern States to establish governments there banished from their borders. You must allow the honest hard-working yoemanry of the land, black and white, assert their rights to good governments, to economic governments, both general and local.

In my opinion, this cannot be done by any one party. It could not be done by the democratic party to-morrow if it had possession of the other branch of the national Legislature, of the Executive, and of all the Departments. The question must be solved by the two races themselves—by the natural condition of reliance and dependence of the one race on the other that exists there. This alone is the secret of the solution. No legislation adopted by the one party or by the other, in my humble judgment, can accomplish it.

I have already, Mr. Chairman, trespassed longer upon the attention of the committee than I intended, and I will now bring my remarks to a close.

Mr. TEESE obtained the floor.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TEESE] yield to me for a moment until I request of the committee that before it rises I may be allowed a few minutes to correct some erroneous impressions made by my honorable colleague, [Mr. HOOKER?] That is all I desire.

Mr. TEESE. How long a time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. LYNCH. I shall not want over twenty or thirty minutes.

Mr. TEESE. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, I am very thankful to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TEESE] for his courtesy in allowing me to submit a few remarks at this time. I will require but a very few minutes, because but little has been said by my honorable colleague [Mr. HOOKER] that requires a reply from me. I desire only to correct some one or two errors that he has fallen into with regard to the condition of affairs in the State which he has the honor so creditably to represent in part on this floor.

I recognize the fact, and none can deny it, that we have had in the republican party in several of the Southern States men whose records it would not be a credit to any one to attempt to defend. We have had some such men in my own State. I do not propose now, I never have had any desire and never have expected, to defend all the men who are identified with the republican party. In my judgment no honest man would attempt to defend all of the members of the party with which he may be identified. I do not think it would be to the credit of my honorable colleague to attempt to defend all of the members of his party in the State of Mississippi or elsewhere, for no one knows better than himself that all of the bad men in Mississippi are not identified with the republican party.

In speaking of carpet-baggers—of that class of men who came to the State for no other purpose than to fill their pockets—my colleague seems to have entirely forgotten that his own party did not only set the example for the colored people to follow in this respect, but the hostility of his party toward the colored voters was such that it was made incumbent upon them to accept the best material that it was possible for them to get. Is it strange, then, that they put some of that class of men in office? But let me explain what I mean when I say the democratic party set the example for the colored people to follow in this respect.

The gentleman ought to be aware of the fact that that very class of men have been taken up by the democratic party and elevated to power and position whenever they would consent to serve that party. I have witnessed with sorrow and regret that the very class of men whom the democratic party would denounce, repudiate, and condemn in one election would be taken up by them at the very next election and enlogized to the skies, although they were carpet-baggers, provided they would join their party.

Does my colleague desire me to make an illustration? I will not do it by referring to my own State. I will not be so uncharitable as to do that, but I will take a case from another southern State, and refresh his memory in that particular. He will perhaps remember that there never was a carpet-bagger in the South that was more universally denounced, repudiated, and condemned by the democratic party than was Ex-Governor Warmoth, of the State of Louisiana. They said so many bad things about him, accused him of so many bad things, that I among others was induced to believe that at least some of them were true. But yet when that gentleman decided to join the democracy, or rather decided to affiliate with them at that election, I was surprised to find that the party that had denounced, repudiated, and condemned him had opened wide its doors for his reception. They did not only receive him immediately into their ranks but they regarded him as one of their most notable and trusted leaders, one of the shining lights of their party, and they were ready to honor him with the highest office in the gift of the people of the State. It is believed that when the important announcement was made that Warmoth intended to affiliate with the democracy they had a grand jollification meeting in honor of that important event, and the chief mogul of the party, I imagine, took the young political convert by the right hand and exclaimed solemnly in these words: "Warmoth, we have regarded you as a bad man; we have accused you of being a corrupt man, a dishonest man, a public plunderer of our people; but we now confess that there is only one sin of which we considered you guilty: affiliation with the republican party. But as you have left that organization it makes no difference with us now how much you may have stolen, how much you may have plundered us, how much you may have corrupted the morals of our people. These little sins will be charged against you no more forever. [Laughter.] Enter thou into the joys of the democracy, for as you have been found faithful over a few things we will now make you ruler over many." [Renewed laughter.] That is in brief the history of the democratic party in the Southern States on the carpet-bag question, in consequence of which I think it comes with very bad grace from the leaders of that party to complain of carpet-bag rule at the South.

So much, sir, for carpet-baggers. As I said before, I will not refer to my own State; I will be too generous to my honorable colleague to do that. I will let that pass; for he knows something about it himself as well as I do.

But now, sir, I want to refer to the question of violence resorted to at the last election in the State of Mississippi, and which my colleague so eloquently denies. I had hoped there would be no necessity for referring to it at length. In the few remarks which I delivered here day before yesterday, I made only brief reference to that point. But, in speaking of violence, I say now with sorrow, with regret, with mortification, that it is true that an armed military organization exists in the State of Mississippi in behalf of the democratic party; and my colleague took particular pains not to deny it, because he cannot deny it. If he thinks he can, I am willing to yield him the floor now to do it. There is an army in the State of Mississippi to-day called the White League. It is a military organization.

I will not say violence was resorted to in all the counties of that State, for it is not true. The election was fairly, peaceably, and honestly conducted in almost every democratic county in that State. The election was fairly, peaceably, and honestly conducted in some of the republican counties in that State. Violence and intimidation were confined on the part of the democracy chiefly to the republican counties. The reason, I suppose, will readily suggest itself why they were confined to republican counties.

I, as well as my honorable colleague, am honestly opposed to electing corrupt men to office, honestly opposed to electing men to positions who will fill them with discredit to themselves and discredit to the party which elected them.

I say the colored people of my own State especially have been particularly anxious to be placed in a position where they could be justified and sustained in voting against their own party when it put up men whose honesty is open to question, but they have never been placed in that position in consequence of the hostile attitude of the party which my colleague so ably represents. He says they are all friendly, no ill will, no bad blood, when he knows, wherever the White-League organization has an existence, that the public declaration of the men who belong to it, as well as the papers which represent it, declare in their speeches and in the columns of those papers that that organization has been brought into existence for the very purpose of bringing about white supremacy, and to crush out the negro because he is a negro, and for no other reason.

That is true of the White League. It is not true of all of the white people of the State, because they all do not belong to it. It is not true of all of the democrats, for they do not all belong to it. But it is true of that organization which has been brought into existence by the bad men in the democratic party for the purpose of securing position by the power of the bullet and not by the power of the ballot.

I will make one illustration to substantiate it. As my colleague referred to one county, I will refer to another. In the county of Claiborne in my State, one of the counties of my district, a county containing about 3,000 voters, 500 of which or thereabouts are democratic and the balance republican—that county, in 1872, out of a total vote of about 2,500, gave 1,752 republican majority. That is just about the average republican majority of that county in an ordinarily fair election. At the last election the White-League organization, being in existence, was armed for the purpose of intimidating the colored people. They borrowed cannon, so I was informed, from some of the steamboats, and had some men from Louisiana come over for the purpose of assisting them in the work of intimidation. They carried that county for the democratic party by a majority of 556, as they said, out of a total vote of about 1,500. They would not let the colored people vote at all at a majority of the voting-places in the county, unless they would vote the democratic ticket. They had men armed for the purpose of preventing them from doing it, and they did prevent them. And yet the gentleman would have you believe that the election in that county was fairly and honestly conducted and that no violence was resorted to, when he knows the reverse to be true.

And I will tell you to-day, Mr. Chairman, and I say to my honorable colleague, that it is to the interest of his party if it is in favor of good government; it is for the interest of all law-abiding men to put down this lawlessness, this violence, and allow men to vote without being intimidated. If he can induce the colored men to vote for him, or for any member of his party, of their own free will, by their own choice, I for one will have no objection to their doing it. In fact, I will be glad to see the day come when the colored man will incur no risk in voting the democratic ticket whenever he wants to do so. But I do not want you to shoot him down if he does not vote the way you want him. And the White League is brought into existence for that very purpose. I do not want you to say, as some of the democratic papers in our State have said, "If you cannot vote him down, knock him down." That is the language of one of the democratic papers in Mississippi.

Now, with all candor, with all fairness, with every feeling of goodwill to the white people as well as to the colored, I will say that I want to see the honest white men of that State who are opposed to mob law and violence rise in their might against this rebellious organization that has been brought into existence for the purpose of carrying elections by violence and not by votes. I assert that this is true of the White League organization. That organization exists in Mississippi to-day for the purpose of carrying elections by violence; and no man can deny this assertion, for Mississippi could not be carried by the democratic party, in my judgment, in any other way.

Let me refer now to the question of taxation in that State. My honorable colleague said in effect that the taxation in Mississippi that had been brought about by the republican administration justified what had been done for the purpose of turning that party out of power. He asserted in effect that they were determined to defeat the republican party in consequence of the corruption, the extravagance, and the taxation that had been heaped upon the people. Now, as a citizen of that State, as a tax-payer, I say that the charge cannot be sustained. I have some figures here in regard to the public debt in Mississippi. I did not know that I would have occasion to use them to-day. But I have them, and I will give my colleague a little information on the question, as he seems to stand very much in need of it:

On the 1st of January, 1874, the beginning of Governor Ames's administration, the public debt of the State, exclusive of what is known as the Chickasaw and common-school fund debts, was about	$821,292
On the 1st of January, 1875, it was about	708,428
Decrease in one year	112,864
On the 1st of January, 1875, as above stated, the debt was about	708,428
On the 1st of January, 1876, it was about	520,138
Decrease in 1875	188,290
Reduction in 1874	112,864
Reduction in 1875	188,290
Reduction in two years	301,154
Actual debt 1st January, 1876, about	520,138

Prior to the inauguration of the administration of Governor Ames in the State of Mississippi the total tax rate was about fourteen mills on the dollar, $14 upon each $1,000 of taxable property. During the two years that Governor Ames had the privilege of serving as governor in that State the taxes were considerably reduced, so that in 1875, instead of being fourteen mills, the tax rate was nine and one-fourth mills on the dollar. Now I ask any member of this House, regardless of party, does he consider that an exorbitant tax—a tax of nine and one-fourth mills—only four mills of which were for what we call general purposes, two mills for a teacher's tax, and three and one-fourth mills to pay the interest on the public debt and to create a sinking fund for its redemption? I never thought that was an exorbitant rate. I never thought it extravagant. And during the two years that Governor Ames served as governor the public debt, as I have above shown, was decreased to about half a million dollars, leaving out what is called the Chickasaw and common-school fund debts; debts the principal of which cannot be paid, the interest of which has to be paid every year. But, leaving out the Chickasaw and common-school fund debts, the debt was decreased to the amount that I have already stated.

Such was the extravagance, such was the profligacy of which my colleague spoke—our debt decreasing each year; our taxes decreasing each year! The value of the State paper increased from 10 to 15 per cent. on the dollar when Governor Ames went out over what it was when he went in. And yet my colleague says that we had extravagance and profligacy to an extent that justified violence and mob law to turn what he is pleased to call a corrupt party out of power. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that that charge cannot be substantiated. I do not believe that the public sentiment of the country will justify the means that were resorted to for the purpose of carrying an election against the known wishes of a majority on such a flimsy pretext as that.

How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Eight minutes.

Mr. LYNCH. During those eight minutes I want to say, that while I acknowledge, while I admit and confess that a large element inside the ranks of the democracy in that State are honestly in favor of vindicating the majesty of the law in protecting every citizen in the exercise and enjoyment of his rights, while I acknowledge this, it is with sorrow and regret that I am compelled at the same time to acknowledge that the public sentiment there sustains and tolerates an organization that has been brought into existence for violence, and violence alone. And I am utterly surprised that my colleague, for whom I have the highest respect, should allow his love of party to carry him so far as to attempt to justify the deeds of violence, the deeds of bloodshed that were resorted to by this organization for the purpose of overcoming the popular majority in that State.

Let the investigation reveal what it may, I stand upon the platform of honest government and honest men to administer the laws; and when the democratic party will recognize the complete equality of the colored man before the law, which they have not yet done, then the colored man will be justified in voting against the republican party when the candidates of that party do not come up to the Jeffersonian standard of honesty and capacity.

Now, sir, let me admonish gentlemen on this floor from other sections, let me admonish the democrats from the North, and I would appeal especially to my honorable friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who so gracefully occupies the chair in the absence of the honorable Speaker—a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard, because I look upon him as a man of moderate views except on some questions, [laughter,] let me say to him, as a leader of his party, and a creditable one, too, at that; let me say to others from the North who are leaders of the democratic party, to put your power, put your votes, put your organization upon record against mob law and violence, and try to gain the colored vote by honest means, by argument, persuasion, and reason. When you succeed in gaining the colored vote by those means no one will regret it. I will not regret it, but I will rejoice to see the day come when men will be enabled to vote as they please without personal risk to themselves by doing so. I trust that the northern democrats will try and get our southern brethren to come up to the standard that you keep at the North, to tolerate differences of opinion, and try and educate them up to the necessity of allowing men to vote how they please and for what party they please. When you do that we shall have peace and good-will at the South. But under existing circumstances that cannot be done. No government can be sustained and upheld by the public sentiment of a people when one portion of the country is controlled and governed by a band of men organized into an army for the purpose of intimidating men who do not belong to the party they are identified with.

Now I appeal to the public sentiment of the country to crush out mobocracy at the South; to vindicate freedom of speech, freedom of opinion, freedom of the press, and the purity of the ballot-box.

That is what I am in favor of, and I trust the gentlemen from the North will see the necessity of this course. Otherwise you will lay the foundation for the dissolution of this Republic.

Mr. Chairman, I could say more if I had more time, for this is a subject that I could speak upon for hours. It is a subject that my honorable colleague knows I am as deeply interested in as he is, and while I take pleasure in saying that a large number of the white democrats in my State did not countenance the violence resorted to for the purpose of overcoming the republican party, yet it is an unfortunate fact that that party could not have been wiped out of existence as it has been by any other means than by violence and intimidation.

I am very thankful to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TEESE] for allowing me to make these remarks.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. TEESE. Mr. Chairman, before considering the question whether New Mexico ought to be admitted into the Union I would first call the attention of the House to what sort of a country it is that the friends of this bill propose to join us as a State in bonds not thereafter to be sundered.

So far as extent of territory is concerned there is no doubt that in acres or square miles it is amply sufficient to form not only one but many States. Having an area of 121,201 square miles, it is larger than the island of Great Britain by nearly 34,000 square miles. It is nearly twice as large as all the New England States together and larger than the five Middle States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland by more than nine thousand square miles.

But when we seek for the advantages, natural or otherwise, belonging to this Territory, they cannot be found. Nowhere in its vast domain do agriculture, trade, commerce, or the useful arts flourish; nay, they can scarcely be said to exist. The report of the majority of the Committee on the Territories admits that, "for the most part, the Territory consists in extensive plains not entirely suited to the purposes of agriculture." The fact is that, except for grazing purposes, it is little better than a barren waste. The rain-fall is so small that what little tillage of the soil there is has always for the most part been accomplished by irrigation. Furthermore, the rain-fall is growing less year by year, and the country is becoming more and more a desert, as is witnessed by the ruins of many deserted pueblos, the inhabitants of which have been compelled to abandon them for the want of water.

The unproductiveness of the country is strikingly demonstrated by the census of 1870, which shows that but 833,549 acres are in farms, and of this more than 82 per cent. remain unimproved. W. F. M. Arny, formerly acting governor of New Mexico, in his work on that country, published in 1873, says:

> This country is not a garden of Eden. On the contrary, the superficial observer would place his ideas of desolation within its limits. * * * It is arid, rainless; presenting contrasts to the American, come from what part he may. * * * Of the area of the public lands in New Mexico unsurveyed, and, of course, unoffered and undisposed of, about one-tenth is susceptible of cultivation.

It will be seen, therefore, that there is nothing to render New Mexico desirable as a State, so far as its soil, natural resources, or possible productions are concerned. It is supposed that there are rich mines, but as yet no great mineral resources have been developed. In short, the whole country almost is an arid desert, with here and there irrigated oases. It is of no value whatever to the Union; and the best thing that could be done with it would be to "prevail on Mexico to take it back," as General Sherman suggested in his testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives in 1874, referred to in the minority report.

But it is said that we are bound by treaty obligations and promises from civil and military officers of the Government made to the people of New Mexico to admit it as a State, and that we are acting in bad faith not to do so. The report of the majority of the committee alleges that—

> The people of New Mexico have from time to time presented their claims to admission into the Union as a State, arising upon the assurances of officers of the United States during military occupation of that country, and also upon the terms of the treaty of cession. * * * General Kearney and other officers of the Army at the time of the occupation of this Territory assured the people of New Mexico that if they consented to annexation to the United States they would be at an early day admitted into the Union. These assurances contributed to the peaceable and bloodless transfer of that Territory.

So far as the treaty obligations are concerned, they are all embraced in the ninth article of the treaty, as follows:

> Mexicans who in the territories aforesaid shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted at the proper time, to be judged by the Congress of the United States, to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution.

It is admitted that there is here no express provision for a speedy admission of New Mexico as a State, and that—

> The terms of this provision of the treaty leave Congress to judge of the proper time when the Territory should be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted to all the rights of the States. But—> it is insisted, in view of the assurances of our officers pending the military occupation of this Territory and the declarations of the authorities of this Government a short time after the execution of the treaty, that it would be unjust to the people of New Mexico to say that it was contemplated, at the time of the transfer of this Territory to the United States, by either of the parties to the treaty, that admission as a State would be indefinitely postponed and denied to the people of this Territory.

Continues the report—

"The declarations of the authorities of this Government" quoted are, first, some general recommendations of President Taylor, advising "an early application by the people of these territories for admission as States," for the purpose, he says, "of avoiding occasions of bitter and angry discussions among the people of the United States," alluding to the agitation of the question of slavery in the Territories, and not in any way referring to any moral or other obligation on the part of the Government arising from any stipulation. The only other declaration quoted or referred to is that of Mr. Buchanan, who, while Secretary of State, pending the ratification of the treaty with Mexico, said:

> Congress, under all the circumstances and under the treaties, are the sole judges of this proper time, because they and they alone under the Federal Constitution have power to admit new States into the Union. That they will always exercise this power as soon as the condition of the inhabitants of any acquired territory may render it proper cannot be doubted. By this means the Federal Treasury can alone be relieved from the expense of supporting territorial governments. Besides, Congress will never turn a deaf ear to a people anxious to enjoy the privilege of self-government. Their desire to become one of the States of this Union will be granted the moment it can be done with safety.

These are all the "acts and declarations of the authorities" which the majority of the committee give us; and it will be observed that President Taylor bases his recommendation upon the idea that certain "angry discussions" might be avoided by early admitting as States the territory acquired from Mexico, and that Mr. Buchanan said the Territory would be admitted when it could be done with safety, of which "Congress, under all the circumstances," are the exclusive judges. I agree that New Mexico should be admitted as soon as it can be done with safety, but I shall endeavor to show that that time is not yet.

The assurances of "General Kearney and other officers of the Army," whereby the people of New Mexico were persuaded "that if they consented to annexation to the United States they would be at an early day admitted into the Union," are not given in the report. I have failed to find any such assurances in the published proclamations of General Kearney, of which there are two, one issued July 31, 1846, enjoining on the citizens of New Mexico to remain quietly at their homes and to pursue their peaceful avocations and promising them protection in their civil and religious rights, the other of the 22d of August, 1846, announcing the flight of Don Manuel Armijo, the late governor, and that for the present he (General Kearney) would be considered as governor of the Territory. In this proclamation he says:

> It is the wish and intention of the United States to provide for New Mexico a free government with the least possible delay, similar to those in the United States, and the people of New Mexico will then be called on to exercise the rights of freemen in electing their own representatives to the territorial Legislature.

He had previously, on the 15th of the same month, stated in an address to the people:

> I have come among you by the orders of my Government to take possession of your country and extend over it the laws of the United States. We consider it, and have done so for some time, a part of the territory of the United States.

Where do we find in any of these utterances of General Kearney the slightest foundation for the statement that he "assured the people of New Mexico that if they consented to annexation to the United States they would be at an early day admitted into the Union?" On the contrary, he expressly and in terms promised them nothing but the privilege of sending representatives to a territorial Legislature. I have not been able to find from a single fact or a single utterence by General Kearney that New Mexico was ever solicited to annexation to the United States by him.

This is the way General Kearney wooed the New Mexicans into giving their "consent" to annexation. I quote from his proclamation of August 22, 1846:

> The undersigned has come to New Mexico with a strong military force, and an equally strong one is following close in his rear. He has more troops than necessary to put down any opposition that can possibly be brought against him, and therefore it would be but folly or madness for any dissatisfied or discontented persons to think of resisting him. * * *
> The undersigned hereby absolves all persons residing within the boundaries of New Mexico from any further allegiance to the republic of Mexico, and hereby claims them as citizens of the United States. Those who remain quiet and peaceable will be considered good citizens and receive protection; those who are found in arms, or instigating others against the United States, will be considered as traitors and treated accordingly.

I have no doubt that General Kearney's "assurances" did contribute "to the peaceable and bloodless transfer of that Territory," because the inhabitants understood that the penalty of misbehavior was death; but I do not see that any other reward was promised except protection in case of good behavior.

I have now endeavored briefly to show that New Mexico, not a desirable acquisition at the first, would not as a State add anything to the value of the Union, and that we are violating no plighted faith in refusing it admission.

But I am opposed to the passage of this bill for the further reason that New Mexico has not a sufficient number of inhabitants to claim as a right admission into the Union, and because the inhabitants who are there are not fitted for self-government, and much less are they fitted to participate in the government of all the other States under the Constitution.

There appears to be a wide difference of opinion as to what the real population of the Territory is. The territorial Legislature in their memorials claim a population of nearly one hundred and fifty thousand. The minority report says:

> This estimate has been carefully considered, and is found without foundation in fact, and depending solely upon the statement contained in the memorial of the Legislature of the Territory to this Congress.

The report then goes on to make a statement, derived from the number of the voting population and other data, from which the total population in 1875 is estimated at 93,926.

As according to the census of 1870 the population was 91,874, the probabilities are that the population does not exceed the number estimated in the report. We have no official or reliable information upon the subject since the census of 1870, and no warrant for saying or believing that the population amounts to as many as 95,000. Now, as according to the quota of the last census the population of a congressional district should exceed 130,000, I should like to know what justice or fairness there is in admitting a new State with between thirty thousand and forty thousand less inhabitants than that number. But when we consider that such State will be entitled to send to the Senate of the United States two Senators, and thus be equal in that branch of the national Legislature to New York with a population exceeding four million, the injustice of such admission is still more apparent.

I am aware that in the admission of two or three of the former Territories the rule which ought to be observed of maintaining the same ratio of representation as in the existing States has been departed from, and their admission is urged as a precedent for the admission of New Mexico. But wrong and injustice can never be justified by precedent. I do not believe it right that a Territory should receive such unequal advantages, and if there were no other reason than the want of sufficient population, that consideration alone would decide my vote against this bill. No doubt the Constitution contemplates that a Territory should be admitted as a State at the proper time, to be judged of by Congress, but it never was contemplated that a Territory should, by becoming a State, be entitled to send to this House a member whose constituency is less than that required for members from other States.

But, sir, although New Mexico has not in my judgment a sufficient number of inhabitants to justify us in admitting it into the Union as a State, and although in former debates upon this subject, whether or not New Mexico had sufficient population to form a State was the principal point discussed, it is the one upon which I lay the least stress, and the one which I think to be altogether of secondary consideration. The admission of States from Territories is after all a matter of discretion with Congress, and peculiar reasons may exist why in given cases Territories with small populations, very much smaller than that of New Mexico, might with some propriety be admitted. But when we consider that there is no reason whatever urged for the admission of this desert wilderness except that other States have been admitted with less population, and when we consider its ignorant, half-civilized population, foreign for the most part to our language, our laws, and our race, what can be said in justification of the passage of this bill?

Sir, whatever may be said as to the impropriety or injustice of admissions of new States heretofore allowed on account of the smallness of their population, we have never yet permitted a State to be brought into the Union on an equal footing with the other States, and to send Senators and Representatives here to make laws for the Government of the United States, unless it appeared that it had the necessary intelligence to govern its own people according to our American ideas of government. It is not alone sufficient that the number of inhabitants of a Territory should be large; on the contrary, the number of inhabitants, such as they are, constituting a given Territory may be a great objection to its admission into the Union; and the great number of ignorant and half-civilized people inhabiting this Territory totally unfit in every respect to form a government republican in form is, to my mind, the chief obstacle to the admission of New Mexico. If it had only one-half its present population, I should be more favorably inclined toward it; but, as it is, the more of such citizens we have the worse we are off.

Sir, it is not numbers alone that constitute a state. Some of the most powerful nations, nations that have governed the world, have occupied territories small in extent, and whose population proper had constituted but a small portion of the people they have controlled and governed for centuries. The Roman empire embraced the known world, but Rome was but a single city, and when it fell that empire ceased to exist. And so with nearly all the ancient nations; while they extended their arts and arms over vast and populous territories the soul of empire existed only at the capital; nay, sometimes only in a single individual whose genius alone guided and controlled the government; as in our own day Napoleon created the French Empire and when his star set that empire vanished. England, upon whose dominions the sun never sets, is small in extent, but her possessions have been acquired and maintained by the skill, intelligence, and valor of her people, not by their numbers. So that while it is true that New Mexico has not a sufficient population to entitle her to demand admission as a State, it is not the chief objection.

Now, sir, I think it can be demonstrated by facts which cannot be questioned that New Mexico, as at present populated, is so far below the standard of the average intelligence, civilization, and enterprise of the citizens of the rest of the United States that she should not be admitted into our sisterhood of States until she shall have become less Mexican, less Indian, and less degraded, and more American, more civilized, and better educated.

Of the 91,874 population of New Mexico in 1870, 48,836 of ten years of age and over could not read. As 86,254 of its inhabitants were native born, it cannot be said that this profound ignorance of more than one-half of its population is owing to an influx of foreigners. Foreigners do not consider this a good country to immigrate to. The New Mexicans are more truly native Americans than any other portion of our citizens, for Governor Arny says that—

> The blood of the Montezumas is to-day three-fifths of the blood of Mexico.

The country has been settled for more than two hundred and fifty years, and it had its villages and cities, and for the privileged few its schools and colleges, when what is now the heart of the United States, populated by many millions, was an unexplored wilderness. During all this time this mongrel race have kept on the even tenor of their way, content to live and die as their ancestors, deriving their instruction from their religious leaders, but having no idea of what a government of the people meant. Now, while all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, yet when such a people, so different from the great mass of our population, seek to participate in the government of the United States, I think they should not be allowed to do so until they shall have more closely assimilated themselves to the rest of our citizens.

A comparison of the intelligence of the people of the more recently admitted States with that of New Mexico will show how widely the material out of which our new States have been formed differs from that of this Territory.

The last State admitted into the Union (not counting Colorado, still in embryo) was Nebraska, which in 1870 had a population of 122,993; the next preceding admitted States being Nevada, with a population of 42,491, or less than one-half that of New Mexico, and Oregon, with a population of 90,923, within less than one thousand of the same number with it. A comparison of these three States with New Mexico will show the difference between American and Mexico-Indian civilization, and will also show that while the former are fitted for a republican form of government, the latter is not.

Much stress has been laid upon the fact that when Nevada was admitted into the Union in 1864 it had but about forty thousand inhabitants, and hence it is claimed that, as New Mexico has more than double that population, it should also be admitted; and if the test of numbers were the only test, the claim would be well founded. But if we have regard to the intelligence of the people, and their ability to govern themselves, we shall find that that State is immeasurably in advance of the Territory; that while the latter is sunk in the depths of mediæval ignorance, the former is up to the full standard of American intelligence and American institutions.

By the census of 1870 the number of persons in Nevada ten years of age and over who could not read was 727, or less than 2 per cent. of its population, while of the population of New Mexico of the same age who could not read the percentage was more than 53 per cent.

In New Mexico there were five public schools. In Nevada there were more than seven times as many, namely, thirty-eight. There were but 138 pupils in all New Mexico who attended the public schools. In Nevada there were nearly ten times as many, namely, 1,856; of these 1,065 were males. In New Mexico but 84 male pupils attended the public schools in 1870.

If we make the same comparison with the other two last admitted States, we will find the same difference to exist. In Nebraska the number of persons ten years of age and over who could not read was 2,365, or less than 2 per cent. of its population. The number of public schools was 781, the number of pupils 17,052.

In Oregon the number of persons of the same class who could not read was 2,609, or less than 3 per cent. of its population. The number of public schools was 594, with 29,822 pupils.

A comparison of the illiteracy of New Mexico with the other existing Territories will be found equally unfavorable to the former. Arizona, in which the illiteracy is the greatest, was organized out of New Mexico, and a portion of the latter Territory with several thousand of its population has been annexed to Colorado.

The percentage of persons in the other Territories of ten years of age and over, who, by the census of 1870, could not read, was as follows, (fractions being disregarded:) Arizona, 27 per cent.; Colorado, 15; Dakota, 8; Idaho, 21; Montana, 3; Utah, 2; Washington, 4; Wyoming, 5.

I think these statistics alone show how much the New Mexicans differ from those whom we have been accustomed to admit to all the rights of citizens of States under the Constitution.

The majority report admits that "the people of New Mexico have not, until within a few years past, manifested a proper disposition to support a system of public schools adequate to bring within the reach of its scholastic population the advantages and benefits of education," though "since 1873 a relative increase in the number of schools is observed, and it is believed that the advancement will continue until the system will be adequate to meet all requirements."

It is well known that the mass of the people of New Mexico are hostile to the public-school system, and that a few years ago they voted against it, although as a matter of policy it is now adopted.

There are, it is true, some schools other than public schools under the care of religious organizations, the census of 1870 showing that there were forty-four schools of all classes, (including the five public schools,) with a total number of seventeen hundred and ninety-eight pupils. I have no doubt the influence of these schools is good; and if there were ten times as many of them, they might approximate toward supplying the wants of the people; but what are forty-four schools in a population of nearly one hundred thousand?

In looking further into the state of this people we find their want of enterprise to correspond with their want of intelligence. There were but five newspapers in the Territory in 1870, with a circulation all told of fifteen hundred and twenty-five. There were but one hundred and eighty-two manufacturing establishments in all the Territory, and the total number of hands employed in manufacturing was four hundred and twenty-seven. There were but thirteen steam-engines and forty-two water-wheels in its whole area of more than one hundred and twenty-one thousand square miles, and the sum total of its population engaged in manufactures and mechanical and mining industries was twenty-two hundred and ninety-five.

But there is another reason why we should not be in haste to admit New Mexico as a State. I refer to the large percentage of its population, consisting of the Montezuma or Pueblo Indians, whose blood, Governor Army says, constitutes about three-fifths of its population, and who are in number about ten thousand. They live in towns, and have regular governments of their own.

Each town has a separate organized government of its own, but all are nearly the same, as most of them adhere to ancient customs and laws. The officers consist of a governor, lieutenant-governor, cacique war captain, and his lieutenant, a constable, and a superintendent of (acequeas) ditches for irrigation, &c. (Army, page 38.)

The memorials of the Legislature of New Mexico referred to and quoted in the majority report, (page 4,) states that they are "among the best citizens of our Territory, * * * mostly a quiet, pastoral people, and as truly loyal to the government under which they live as any people under the sun." This is a pretty strong indorsement and from very high authority.

Moreover, it has been decided by the supreme court of New Mexico that these Indians being citizens of the republic of Mexico at the date of the treaty of Gaudalupe Hidalgo, by the terms of that treaty became citizens of the United States, and are entitled to all the privileges of citizens of the United States. Accordingly this bill provides—

That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory under the laws thereof, shall be qualified to be elected, and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention, &c.

Now let us see what kind of people these are who are among the best citizens of New Mexico, and who by the terms of this bill are at once entitled to vote. Army says of them:

There are yet many who expect the return of Montezuma as the Jews await the advent of Christ, and believe when he comes to be their king they will be united, rich, powerful, and will regain their prestige and empire. (Page 7.)

Quoting from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1854, he says:

The Pueblos are all nominally Roman Catholics, and, as far as can be discerned, appear to be sincere and earnestly devoted to the rites of that church. * * * However, there is every reason to believe that the Pueblos still adhere to their native belief and ancient rites. That most of them have faith in Montezuma is beyond a doubt. * * * He foretold events that actually came to pass, and it is related of him that he performed many wonderful things. * * *

From all I have been able to learn, I am fully convinced that the Montezuma who was held in such reverence by the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico and Arizona was a descendant of the Montezumas, (kings of Mexico,) and who was looked upon both as a king and priest, subordinate only to "the Great Spirit," whom they believe to be represented by the sun, the great orb of day, and the representative of light and heat. Hence they kept burning upon their altars in their estufas (places of worship) fire, the earthly representative of that light and heat imparted by the sun, and I have reason to believe that to this day these edifices are used for this purpose.

During the past few years I have visited most of the pueblos (Indian towns) now extant, and also the ruins of others which have been abandoned. * * * Mr. Davis, in his work Conquest of Mexico, in writing of the Pecos pueblo, says: * * * "It is said that Montezuma kindled a sacred fire in the estufa of that pueblo and commanded that it should be kept burning until he came back to deliver them from the Spaniards. He was expected to appear with the rising sun, and every morning the Indians ascended to the tops of the houses and strained their eyes looking to the east for the appearance of their deliverer and king." * * *

During the period that I was acting governor of New Mexico in 1863 I was visited at Santa Fé on several occasions by a venerable Pueblo Indian. He condescended to inform me that all the Pueblos now in secret perform rites and ceremonies looking still for the return of Montezuma. This is corroborated by the much-lamented General Kit Carson, who is the only person I know of who has been permitted to enter their estufas, and witnessed on one occasion their worship, which was a dance in the estufa around the "altar of fire." Last summer I visited some of the Pueblos at the time of their great feasts, but was not permitted to enter the estufa. The outside worship was a blending of the Roman Catholic ceremonies with some of their own heathen rites, the principal of which was the cacaina, a dance, at which time they make offerings of flour, corn, and other articles. On the occasion of their great feasts I noticed that in the morning at sunrise they were on the house-tops with their faces turned toward the rising sun. (Pages 34-37.)

If these people are among the best citizens of New Mexico, and its Legislature says that they are, to what depths of degradation must the average New Mexican be sunk? And yet it is proposed that such citizens are to constitute a State of this Union, who are unable to decide whether Christ or Montezuma is the Saviour of the world; who marry and baptize their children according to Christian rites, while in secret they keep burning the sacred fire, emblem of the sun, and daily hail the god of day, as they watch and wait with patient longing the risen Montezuma, who will re-establish the fallen empire of the Aztecs and avenge the centuries of wrongs to which his people have been subjected.

Although we cannot sit in judgment upon the religion of these people, nor upon their manners and customs, and they have a perfect right to follow their own consciences and inclinations in such matters, yet, when they are asking as a boon to be admitted into our family of States, the granting of which lies entirely in our discretion, we have a right to consider whether they are homogeneous with our other population, and if not, we have a right to keep them out of the family until they become one with us. For myself, I do not believe that any two races ever did or ever will exist side by side under the same government where anything like true equality was maintained. You may enact such equality in statute laws or in constitutions, but the instinct of race is stronger than law. You may make it a penal offense not to admit a person of a different-hued skin from your own into a pew in your church or a box in your theater, but the races will still keep apart, and each will seek its own, leaving the philosophers and politicians to discourse upon the unity of the race, and the liberty, equality, and fraternity of man; or if perchance, as in the case of New Mexico, you can succeed to a degree in amalgamating the races, you debase the blood of both to such an extent that the aboriginal barbarian pagans become the respectable class.

The New Mexicans are not only un-American in race and ideas, but they are also foreign to us in language. The report of the majority of the committee to whom this bill was referred claims that there are now in the Territory one hundred and thirty-three public schools supported by taxation, one hundred and eleven of which are taught in the Spanish language exclusively, twelve in the English and Spanish languages, and ten in the English language. Such a thing as a Spanish common-school may be possible, but this bill recognizes the peculiarity of such a system of education by first granting land for the support of common schools, and then enacting:

That the English language shall not be excluded from, but be taught in, said common schools.

Now, I do not wish to be understood as saying that New Mexico ought not to be admitted because the Spanish language is mostly spoken in that Territory, but I mention it as one of the matters to be considered in connection with others, of which I have spoken, before we give the consent of Congress to its becoming a State.

For my part, sir, I am opposed to admitting into the Union a community to such a great extent foreign to us in language, ideas, manners, and customs, ignorant and superstitious to the last degree, and a people who have always been accustomed to be under the guardianship and direction of teachers of a superior race.

But, Mr. Chairman, the majority report, though it seems to me somewhat rose-colored, gives us sufficient encouragement to expect, from the alleged increased attention to the subject of education, that New Mexico will become, perhaps at no distant day, fitted to take its place as a State. Perhaps the next census may show that the time has then arrived. Whenever reliable statistics shall show that American ideas have permeated the masses of the people, and that the inhabitants are sufficient in number, then let New Mexico be admitted. But until Anglo-Saxon civilization and enterprise, the results of which are the school-house, the printing-press, the steam-engine, the telegraph, the railroad, shall have taken deeper root than now appears, let it remain a Territory, and let the prospect of admission when fitted be held out to its people as an incentive to increased efforts for preparation to become a State, equal in intelligence, or at least approximately equal, to the rest of the Union.

THE POWER TO MAKE INVESTIGATIONS BY COMMITTEES OF CONGRESS—THE PRIVILEGES OF WITNESSES.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, on the 14th day of March, 1876, Hallet Kilbourn was by this House ordered to be imprisoned for contempt of its authority in refusing to testify as a witness before a committee duly authorized to require his evidence. The investigation which the committee was making was one in which the Government was interested. The District of Columbia had for some years been under the control of officers acting under a law of Congress. It was alleged that the District officers had been guilty of great frauds, and investigations in the Forty-third Congress seemed to prove it. It was alleged that a combination of men known as the "District ring" had fraudulently conspired together to make public improvements at enormous prices, and that they had been guilty of great frauds resulting in an immense bonded debt, a large part of which Congress is bound to pay. It was also alleged that when Jay Cooke & Co. failed Hallet Kilbourn held the title to large amounts of property as trustee in which Jay Cooke & Co. were interested as part owners. The Government, as a creditor of Jay Cooke & Co., was interested in knowing what property was so held by Kilbourn. It was alleged that he could give this information, and that it would be disclosed by his books and papers, which he refused to produce.

It was in view of these facts that Kilbourn was imprisoned. (House Report No. 242, first session Forty-fourth Congress, on Real Estate Pool, March 16, 1876; Miscellaneous Document No. 174, first session Forty-fourth Congress.

He applied for a writ of habeas corpus, which was allowed by Hon. David K. Cartter, one of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and who, after argument, on the 28th of April, discharged Kilbourn from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

I desire to submit a few remarks on some of the questions involved in this whole case.

The question whether the House should direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to produce the body of Kilbourn in obedience to the writ of habeas corpus was decided by very nearly a party vote. This question was never regarded as a party question heretofore. This will appear at least to be the fact in the case of Richard Irwin, in the Forty-third Congress.

In the second session of the Forty-third Congress the case of Richard Irwin, imprisoned by order of the House for refusing to testify in the Pacific Mail investigation, was considered. (Congressional Record, volume 9, pages 62, 64, 174, 471, 509, 589, 590, 609, 698.) Mr. DAWES offered the resolution for his imprisonment December 21, 1874, (page 175.) It was adopted by a majority so large there was no division, (page 182.)

On the 14th January, 1875, the Sergeant-at-Arms reported that a writ of habeas corpus was issued, and that the judge refused to hear it without a return of the body, (page 471.) The House refused to surrender him by a vote of 96 to 51, (p. 478.) The court refused to receive a return without the production of the body.

On the 15th January, 1875, the House, on a vote by yeas and nays of 107 to 64, surrendered him to the court.

The vote was as follows, the republicans printed in italics, (page 516.)

Here are fifty-one republicans and thirteen democrats voting against surrendering the witness in answer to the writ of habeas corpus.

Well, sir, the judge heard the case, and decided the House had the right to imprison and that the judge had no power or right to pass upon the legality of the action of the House. The troops "marched up the hill and then marched down again." The views which I entertained when a republican House was investigating frauds I still entertained when a democratic House was seeking light and knowledge under so many difficulties.

When the question arose as to Kilbourn, I thought we could not afford to throw any obstacle in the way of investigation, that we could not afford in justice to the country to permit the members of this democratic House to say they had not a fair chance to investigate every subject and every question proper for examination in this form.

In the remarks I made in this House on the question of surrendering Kilbourn, I said in substance, among other things, that the decision which the House would make would settle the law and practice on the subject. The House decided in favor of the surrender, and so I regard the practice as settled that a witness imprisoned by order of the House for contempt in refusing to testify may apply for a writ of habeas corpus, and when the writ is issued it must be obeyed by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and it is his duty to produce the body to the court or judge issuing the writ.

As it is now settled that the body must be produced, any order of the House must necessarily be unnecessary and wrong. It is inconsistent with the idea that a court or judge has a right to require the production of the body.

In accordance with these views I introduced a bill on the 20th of April, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

A bill to enlarge the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever any person shall be detained or imprisoned by order of the Senate of the United States or of the House of Representatives he shall be entitled to the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus; and the Sergeant-at-Arms, or other officer or person having the custody of any person so detained or imprisoned, shall, in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus, produce to the court, judge, or justice who issued the writ the body of the person so detained without any order for that purpose from said Senate or House of Representatives. The application for such writ by or on behalf of said person so imprisoned or detained shall be made, in the first instance, to the Chief Justice of the United States, or any justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or, in the absence of these from the city of Washington, or in case of disability, the application shall be made to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or to the chief justice or any associate justice thereof.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall be imprisoned or detained by any court of the United States, or any justice or judge thereof, for contempt, shall be entitled to apply to any court having appellate jurisdiction in any case, from the court, justice, or judge having made such order of detention or imprisonment, or to any justice or judge of said court having such appellate jurisdiction, for a writ of habeas corpus, and the same shall be issued, served, obeyed, proceeded with, and determined as in other cases.

At the same time I introduced a bill further to protect the rights of citizens and to secure the liberty of the press, as follows:

A bill to limit the power of courts to punish for contempts, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishments for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases except to the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice; the misbehavior of the officers of said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of any court, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of said courts. And no person shall be punishable for contempt who is liable to be indicted for the same matter which constitutes the contempt. No court shall, by order or otherwise, prohibit the publication in any newspaper or other publication of any of its proceedings, or of any evidence produced or given in the trial of any cause.

I do not propose to discuss either of these bills now. They are before the appropriate committee, and will doubtless receive due consideration at the proper time.

I do propose now, however, to say a few words as to what should be done in view of the decision of Judge Cartter, and to refer briefly to the decision itself.

The case as stated by the judge and his opinion will be found in House Miscellaneous Document No. 169, submitted to the House on the 28th of April, and referred to the Judiciary Committee, and still more fully in House Miscellaneous Document No. 174, submitted to the House on the 29th of May.

The counsel who represented the Sergeant-at-Arms before Judge Cartter gave the proper notice of appeal from his decision or order to the general term or court in banc of the supreme court of the District.

I think this appeal should be prosecuted. There is no power in the Supreme Court of the United States to review the order made by Judge Cartter at chambers, but there is an appeal from this order to the full bench of judges of the supreme court of the District. All this it seems to me results from an examination of the statutes.

Since the Supreme Court of the United States has and by Congress can be given no original jurisdiction in habeas corpus, and can have none save in the exercise of its appellate powers, (see 8 Wallace, 85–89; 18 Wallace, 166;) and since the Supreme Court of the United States has received from Congress no appellate powers in review or reversal of an order of a judge at chambers, (as Cartter's late order is,) therefore there can now be no review of Cartter's order in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The supreme court of the District of Columbia has the legal status in our system of the circuit courts of the United States, (page 91, section 760 Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia,) and those special terms held by separate judges of this court become generally district courts of the United States, (section 762 of Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, page 91,) and from there last appeals go to the general term or to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, (section 772, page 92.)

Owing to these provisions it seems clear that Judge Cartter, sitting in Kilbourn's case, sits as a judge of a court inferior to a circuit court. He certainly does when he sits in "special term." Does he not when he sits in habeas corpus at chambers? If he does, then section 763 of the general Revised Statutes gives an appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia from his recent order.

The question whether there is any appeal from the decision of the supreme court of the District to the Supreme Court of the United States is not so clear. (See section 764 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; section 761 Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, page 91; and section 763 of Revised Statutes of the United States.)

There are two qustions deserving attention:

One is that last referred to, to wit, is there any appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia from Cartter's decision under section 763 general Revised Statutes? page 143.

The other is this: Suppose there be an appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and suppose that court should affirm Cartter's decision, which is not at all probable, then can that judgment be reviewed on error by the Supreme Court of the United States under the general powers of the supreme court as a court of error, as provided in section 691 of the Revised Statutes? There would be no question on this point if the decision should be in favor of remanding Kilbourn. (See Milligan's case, 4 Wallace, page 2; Holmes vs. Jenning, 14 Peters, page 540; Lange, 18; Wallace, page 163, and Phillips's Practice, page 55–56.)

Would the fact that the relator, Kilbourn, should be discharged by the circuit court prevent the supreme court from revising the judgment of the circuit court discharging the relator? And does the fact that section 764 of the Revised Statutes cuts off appeals to the supreme court in such case as this deprive the Sergeant-at-Arms of the proceeding in error if section 691 gives it?

These are questions which at least deserve examination and decision.

I now propose to notice briefly the opinion of Judge Cartter, already referred to.

He held that the imprisonment of Kilbourn was illegal, because the statute of January 24, 1857, as carried into sections 102 and 104 of the Revised Statutes, substituted for the common parliamentary-law power of the House to punish, the statutory punishment prescribed by these sections. In other words, he held that the moment the House adjudged Kilbourn in contempt, its power to punish ceased, and he became liable to indictment. His opinion says:

> With the judgment of the House in contempt its power to punish terminated, and the punishment prescribed by law supervened.

This denies all jurisdiction on the part of the House over the person of Kilbourn after he was adjudged in contempt.

This is in flat contradiction of the opinion of the same judge, delivered in April, 1874, in the case of Stewart vs. Blaine, (1 MacArthur, 457.) That was an action by Stewart against BLAINE of trespass for assault and false imprisonment. The complaint was that BLAINE, as Speaker of the House, issued a warrant for the arrest and imprisonment of Stewart, by virtue of which he was imprisoned. The warrant was issued in pursuance of an order of the House, adjudging Stewart to be in contempt for refusing to testify and directing the warrant to issue. It was under the same law now in force. It was ably argued, with a citation of authorities designed to show that the order made by this House was final and conclusive. The court held that—

> The House of Representatives has power to commit for contempt, and when a party is found guilty of a contempt, the order of the House directing his commitment is a complete protection to the Speaker who orders him into custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

And Chief Justice Cartter said:

> If jurisdiction over the subject and person of the plaintiff resided in the House, the ministerial functions discharged by the Speaker and Sergeant-at-Arms in the premises were justified in the jurisdiction.

Notice the words, "if jurisdiction over the subject and person resided in the House," then the Speaker is protected. If the House had no jurisdiction to make the order of imprisonment, then the Speaker would not be protected. This is the necessary effect of the language employed in this decision. It is the law, as settled by abundant authority. (Champaign County Bank vs. Smith, 7 Ohio State, page 51.)

And when Chief Justice Cartter held in Stewart vs. Blaine that no action would lie, he necessarily held that the House had the power to imprison, and that it is not true, as he decided in Kilbourn's case, that the power of the House to punish terminated with the judgment in contempt.

The chief justice did not support his opinion in Kilbourn's case by the citation of a single authority, nor by any process of reasoning. It is a mere declaration that the law is so—ipse dixit—and that is the end of it.

In the passage which I have read from his opinion he assumes:

I. That in imprisoning Kilbourn the House exercised "its power to punish;" in other words, that the imprisonment of a witness for a refusal to testify is "punishment."

But it is not "punishment" either for the purpose nor in the sense in which men are punished under criminal statutes for crime.

The Supreme Court of the United States decided in re Chiles that:

> Punishments for contempt of court have two aspects, namely: 1. To vindicate the dignity of the court from disrespect shown to it or its orders.
> 2. To compel the performance of some order or decree of the court which it is in the power of the party to perform and which he refuses to obey.

(22 Wallace, 157; House Miscellaneous Document No. 174, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 100-128; Yates vs. Lansing, 9 Johnson, 417; Opinion of Attorney-General in Houston's case, June 25, 1834; King vs. Ossulston, 2 Strange, 1107; State vs. Woodfen, 5 Iredell, North Carolina, 199; 1 Bishop's Criminal Law, section 1067.)

II. The opinion in the Kilbourn case assumes that sections 102 and 104 of the Revised Statutes "terminated" the "power" of the House to imprison for contempt the moment the House entered its "judgment in contempt." In other words, that these sections either repealed the common-law power of the House to imprison, or, as the opinion says, these sections were "not in extinguishment of the constitutional right of punishment [by the House] for contempt, but in definition and expression of IT."

It must be conceded that the common-law power which Chief Justice Cartter declared to exist in Stewart vs. Blaine still exists and existed as to Kilbourn, unless the power was either, first, repealed, or, second, transferred to the courts by sections 102 and 104 of the Revised Statutes. But neither of these positions is sustained either by authority or reason.

1. The common-law power to imprison was not repealed by the Revised Statutes.

There is in these sections no express repeal; there are no "negative" words employed to deny the existence of the common-law power. It is a rule of law that a common-law power is not repealed except by a statute employing negative words for the purpose.

Repeals by implication are not favored.

2. The power to imprison for contempt has not been transferred to the courts.

Chief Justice Cartter seems to have held that the power of the House was transferred to the courts.

Referring to the common-law power of the House to punish, he says the statute is "in definition and expression of it."

(a) There are several difficulties in the way of such transfer.

The statute contains no declaration of any such transfer.

The act of 1857 provides that any witness who shall refuse to testify before a committee of Congress "shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable to indictment." (11 Statutes, page 155.)

Judge Cartter, in commenting on this, says:

> By reference to the statute of 1857 it will be seen that Congress contemplated additional penalties to the penalties that inhered in the power of the respective Houses, and so expressed it in the words "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing" The present statute, for some reason in the wisdom of Congress, rejected the language commanding the additional punishment, leaving the penalty of the last amended statute as the sole punishment of the offense.
> This last statute stands unembarrassed, not only as an expression of the legislative will, but as a legislative interpretation of congressional power to inflict double punishment.
> It provides in express terms that the offense shall constitute a misdemeanor and shall be punished by fine and imprisonment through process of indictment and trial by jury.

This is an utter perversion of the law as found in the Revised Statutes. The Revised Statutes do drop out the words "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing." But every lawyer knows that the Revised Statutes were designed to state the law as it previously existed, without any change. These words were dropped out as unnecessary. The attempt to base an argument on the omission of those words would lead to a rule of construction which would utterly pervert the whole purpose of a large part of the Revised Statutes.

(b) The power of the House to punish is inherent in its existence as a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and is derived from its organization or creation by the Constitution.

A power which is parliamentary in its character and purposes cannot be transferred to or exercised by courts. The power of the House to imprison is not "judicial" power, because, by the Constitution, "the judicial power of the United States," all such power is vested in the courts. (Article 3, section 1; Martin vs. Hunter, 1 Wheaton, page 337.)

The power of the House to imprison is therefore not "judicial." It is legislative or parliamentary. It is a personal authority, intrusted by the Constitution to the members of the House. It requires the exercise of their judgment and discretion. It cannot be exercised by any court or judge, because it has been determined that a court or judge cannot be required to exercise any but judicial power. (Hayburn's case, 2 Dallas, page 409, note.)

It has been determined that Congress cannot abdicate or transfer its legislative power to any other body or tribunal. (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, page 117; 1 Ohio State, page 77; 6 Pennsylvania State, page 507; 11 Pennsylvania State, page 61; 4 Indiana, page 342; 11 Indiana, page 482; 26 Vermont, page 362; 17 Texas, page 441; 3 Rhode Island, page 33; 15 Barbour, pages 112 and 122; 8 New York, page 483; 23 Barbour, page 349; 4 Harr., page 479; 2 Iowa, page 165; 5 Iowa, page 491; 9 Iowa, page 203; 3 Michigan, page 243.)

I conclude therefore that the decision of the judge in the case of Kilbourn finds no sanction in law, precedent, or reason.

I believe in protecting citizens in their custody of private papers not essential to the discovery of facts which the public interests require to be made known.

I will state what I conceive to be the proper rule upon this subject. Neither a committee of Congress nor a court can compel the production of private papers on mere suspicion that they may be pertinent to the inquiry which the committee or the court may be authorized to make.

The Constitution provides that—

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized. (Article 4, amendments.)

The act of Congress of September 24, 1789, (1 United States Statute, 82) authorizes the courts to require parties "to produce books or writings which contain evidence pertinent to the issue."

But to procure an order requiring the production, "a prima facie case of the existence of the paper and its materiality must be made out [by affidavit."] (Iasigi vs. Brown, 1 Curtis, C. C, 401; Hylton vs. Brown, 1 Washington, C. C., 298; Bas vs. Steele, 3 idem, 381; Dunham vs. Riley, 4 idem, 126; Vasse vs. Mifflin, idem, 519; 3 Chitty's General Practice, 434; Law's United States Courts, 35, 36; Herschfield vs. Clark, 34 English Law and Equity, 549; Coster vs. Baring, idem, 365; 1 Redfield's Greenleaf on Evidence, section 559. See Garland's House Report, second session Twenty-fourth Congress, evidence of William D. Lewis, who refused to produce private correspondence; House Report No. 242, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, March 16, 1837, on real-estate pool.)

Until, therefore, it is shown by prima facie evidence that the papers which are required to be produced are material, there is no power or right to require their production. It certainly cannot be claimed, or at least not maintained, that either a court or a committee of Congress can upon any principle of law, justice, or reason demand the production of papers in bulk or in gross, or any papers, unless it be first shown that they are material to the pending inquiry or investigation. If this were not so, the most sacred relations of life might be ruthlessly invaded, the business of men be exposed to their ruin, and the privacy of home be laid bare to the gaze of the world.

To this I could never assent. But in a case where the proper foundation is laid showing papers to be material to an investigation Congress has a right to require their production, and no court can interfere with or destroy that jurisdiction. The owner of the papers is not the sole judge of their pertinency to a pending inquiry, and hence he cannot arbitrarily decide upon his right to withhold them.

The tribunal which makes the investigation must decide after it has received the evidence showing the materiality of the papers to the subject of inquiry.

But in making this decision the tribunal should carefully reject all papers affecting any citizen unless they be material to the inquiry.

The rules of law which I have stated are sufficient to attain the ends of justice.

A witness having the custody of papers can be required to state if he has knowledge of any papers relating in any degree to the subject of inquiry.

He can be required to examine them with a view to ascertain the fact. A refusal could be punished as for a contempt.

Here, then, are means ample to secure the ends of justice—the same means deemed material in every court of justice.

But I will not pursue this inquiry further. The whole subject has been fully and ably discussed in the elaborate arguments before the chief justice who decided the Kilbourn case. While I cannot agree with the conclusions of that distinguished judge, I do not doubt his integrity, ability, and independence, for all which he is so generally and justly admired.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair, as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORD. I move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock, according to the order made this morning.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman, before he presses that motion, allow me to offer a resolution for reference?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that that cannot be done under the order the House made this morning.

Mr. BANKS. I was not aware of that.

TEXAS BORDER TROUBLES.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I rise to a correction of the Journal, in which there is an error that I have but lately discovered. On the 4th of April, as the RECORD shows, the report of the Committee on Texas Border Troubles was made a special order for the 20th of April, and from day to day until disposed of. I find that order entered upon the Calendar as a special order for the 20th of April, but no mention is made of the fact that it is a continuing order "from day to day till disposed of." The RECORD shows that such was the order made by the House, and I ask that the correction be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent. If there be no objection the entry will be made according to the fact.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] that the House now take a recess until eight o'clock.

Mr. STONE. Pending that motion, I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. LORD. Allow me a moment. The House made an order to-day that the session of this evening should be for debate only on the Geneva award bill; the debate is to be confined to that subject, and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his motion.

Mr. STONE. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. EDEN. I desire to have some changes of reference made in the cases of bills improperly referred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House made to-day no business whatever can be transacted. The question is on the motion for a recess.

Mr. ODELL. I renew the motion that the House now adjourn.

Mr. LORD. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that motion. The session of this evening will be for debate only upon the Geneva award bill, and several gentlemen desire to speak upon that subject.

Mr. ODELL. I withdraw the motion.

The motion of Mr. LORD was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until eight o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House re-assembled at eight o'clock p. m., Mr. COX, Speaker pro tempore, in the chair.

GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House, made this day, the session this evening is for debate only on the bill (H. R. No. 2685) for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEADE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Speaker, we are favored by the Judiciary Committee with three distinct recommendations looking to the distribution of the balance of the fund known as the Geneva award. If the gentlemen of this committee had been able to devise instead a feasible recommendation for the abrogation of so much of the treaty of Washington as relates to the subject of the Alabama claims, I would be far better satisfied than I now am with either report; but it was doubtless impracticable to do this, for the provisions of the treaty bear the nation's pledge of faith and honor. But, while we may not now question those provisions, I cannot withhold the reflection that they are a legacy of questionable merit, and I predict our present difficulty in disposing of the award based upon them will prove but the precursor to us of far greater embarrassments to rise up in our relations with Great Britain, and which might have been transferred had we avoided the treaty altogether. As a blunder in our diplomacy, it is all the more inexcusable, because the treaty and its rules of diligence in the sixth article thereof were adopted after all occasion for them on our part had passed, and but for which England must have remained at the mercy of her traditional perfidy, while in the adoption thereof she measurably secures protection from it.

There was a sugar-coating to this treaty in a friendly regret expressed for the escape from British ports and the depredations of the Alabama and other vessels; besides there was indemnity promised, which would go a great way in reconciling a large interest to an Administration against which it had many reasons for just complaint; for none of our citizens have been or continue to be so injuriously affected by the policy of the party in power as those engaged in commerce upon the high seas, and none were more likely to assert themselves at the test of the Administration in the election of 1872.

The treaty of Washington established the tribunal of arbitration which assembled at Geneva and contingently provided in its seventh article for an award in gross for all the claims referred to such tribunal, and the award in pursuance of such contingent provision was $15,500,000 in gold. This was the measure of damages of which Mr. Johnson had written.

> I am at a loss to imagine what would be the measure of damages which it supposes our Government should be indemnified for. How is it to be ascertained? By what rule is it to be measured? A nation's honor can have no compensation in money, and the depredations of the Alabama were of property in which our nation had no pecuniary interest.

It is true, however, that we have now only to deal with the results of that tribunal, however impolitic, unwise, and distasteful may have been or hereafter may be regarded the provisions of the treaty which called it into existence.

The language of the award is as follows:

> The tribunal, making use of the authority conferred upon it by article 7 of the said treaty, by a majority of four voices to one, awards to the United States a sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformably to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty.
> And, in accordance with the terms of article 11 of the said treaty, the tribunal declares that "all the claims referred to in the treaty as submitted to the tribunal are hereby fully, perfectly, and finally settled."
> Furthermore it declares that "each and every one of the said claims, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, or made, preferred, or laid before, the tribunal, shall henceforth be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and inadmissible."

Now, Mr. Speaker, as plain as the language of this award appears, its intent is the subject of controversy, upon which our legislation depends. By act of Congress approved June 23, 1874, a provision was made for the distribution of this fund; but in following the phraseology of the act, in connection with the discussion which led to its passage, we can hardly avoid the conviction that our predecessors were embarrassed by the magnitude and variety of the claims presented, and sought rather to avoid the possibility of error than to establish rules for the complete distribution of the fund.

This act provides for the determination by the court of commissioners of Alabama claims of all claims for damages resulting from the Alabama and Florida and their tenders and the Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne, all known as inculpated cruisers, so far following the language of the Geneva decision on the question of diligence on the part of Great Britain. Section 12 of the act provides various rules for the establishment of damages, some of which, as will be hereafter observed, extend materially the scope of the provisions before restricted to acts embraced under the head of diligence.

It is supposed that substantially all claims admissible under this act have been presented for adjudication, and there remains, after sufficient provision being made for them, a balance of about $10,000,000 of the proceeds and accumulations of the Geneva award, which balance this Congress is asked to appropriate for the parties respectively described in the report of the committee, as follows:

First. Persons who had vessels destroyed during the late rebellion by the cruisers exculpated by such tribunal.
Second. Persons who paid war premiums by reason of such cruisers being upon the sea.
Third. Insurance companies who insured vessels destroyed by the cruisers inculpated by the tribunal of arbitration.
Fourth. Persons excluded by section 12 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, because not bearing during the late rebellion true allegiance to the United States.

In omitting discussion concerning the fourth class, the remainder naturally arrange themselves into the first and second classes on the one hand, as opposed by the third class on the other hand, and the discussion of the claims of these respective parties as naturally tend to these points. First, was the Geneva decision and award intended to prescribe rules for the distribution of the money awarded; and, if so, what rules were prescribed? And, second, if no such rules were intended, then on what basis, as being equitable and just, should the further distribution be had?

I have alluded to the seventh article of the treaty as providing for an award in gross for all the claims referred to the tribunal, and have also quoted the language of the award made in conformity with such provisions, as well as the provisions of article 11 of said treaty.

From neither of these quotations do we perceive any intention to designate any particular class as entitled to receive compensation or pecuniary benefit; but, on the contrary, an obvious intention appears to avoid any such conclusion, which view of the subject is heightened by the first paragraph of the treaty, which recites in the general terms that—

Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims."

It is probably true that the second paragraph of the treaty limits the regret expressed in regard to the escape of vessels from British ports to those more nearly afterward classified as inculpated cruisers. But no such restriction is contained in the third and comprehensive paragraph which provides for a reference to the tribunal of arbitration of all the claims referred to in the first paragraph generically known as the "Alabama claims," "in order," to use the precise language of the treaty, "to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States," &c.

It is a matter of history to be borne in mind that up to the date of this treaty there was no distinction or discrimination yet made respecting inculpated or exculpated cruisers, and that complaints against Great Britain were commonly and to all intents equally preferred concerning both these classes, and the term "Alabama claims" was known and considered to apply equally to all classes as having originated in the precipitate recognition on the part of Great Britain of the belligerent rights of the so-called Confederate States, and of course prior to the establishment by the treaty of the rules of due diligence which were thereafter to limit the liability of a neutral, and in a particular manner restricting the measure of damages in the cases which form the subject-matter of the treaty, although that treaty provided in its eleventh article for a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims thereinbefore referred to, as well those which had as those which might have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the tribunal.

And again, as if contemplating the very question now here raised, it is provided in article 7 of the treaty that the tribunal may award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all the claims referred to it in case of the determination by the tribunal of the failure by Great Britain to fulfill any of the duties enjoined by the rules of diligence prescribed by article 6 as applied to each of the vessels whose acts were subject of complaint, and in lieu of the appointment under the tenth article of a board of assessors to ascertain and determine what claims were valid and what amount or amounts should be paid by Great Britain on account of the liability arising from such failure.

Now, when we consider that up to the period at least of the execution of this treaty, and still further on to the payment by Great Britain to the United States of the sum which the tribunal had awarded in gross, there was by no possible construction of law any liability whatsoever on the part of either the United States or Great Britain to any of the claimants as referred to in the treaty, the conclusion is obvious to my mind that the alternative modes prescribed by the treaty for the payment of any sum contemplated by it had clearly in view that either in the one case the separate claims should be passed upon with a view to the more direct and expeditious payment by the United States as from an actual adjudication from the provisions of the treaty, or that, in the other aspect, the payment of a gross sum would leave our Government in the position to make such distribution as its more intimate knowledge from all the circumstances attending each particular case would enable it to do with equity and justice toward the real sufferers by reason of the acts complained of, and without reference to technical rules of international law as provided in the treaty, and which were only applicable in considering the relations of the one nation with the other.

That the latter mode was desired by this Government is distinctly set forth in the letter of instructions from Mr. Secretary Fish to our counsel at Geneva. It says:

The President desires me to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments * * * to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. And in the treatment of the entire case you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution.

And Mr. Cushing, one of the counsel referred to, in writing after the award, stated of this letter of instruction:

The counsel of the United States obeyed the instructions given them, and did not commit the United States to any theory of distribution whatever, either by way of inclusion or exclusion, but left that question to be determined by the wisdom and discretion of Congress.
The United States at Geneva laid before the tribunal all the claims of the citizens of the United States which had been presented to the Government without vouching for the validity of any of them, but insisted that the United States were not bound by the printed schedule, but only by the description of the treaty—all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels, and generally known as the Alabama claims.—Protocol xxvi.

And as explanative of the motive which actuated our Government in instructing our representatives at Geneva to obtain the award of a sum in gross, Mr. Cushing has written in his book on the treaty of Washington as follows:

The award is to the United States, in conformity with the letter of the treaty, which has for its well-defined object to remove and adjust complaints and claims on the part of the United States.
But the history of the treaty and of the arbitration shows that the United States recover, not for the benefit of the American Government as such, but of such individual citizens of the United States as shall appear to have suffered loss by the acts or neglects of the British government. It is, however—not a special trust, legally affected to any particular claim or claimants, but a general fund, to be administered by the United States in good faith, in conformity with their own conceptions of justice and equity, within the range of the award. * * * Nor does the tribunal define affirmatively what claims should be satisfied otherwise than in the comprehensive terms of the award, which declares that the sum awarded is the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformably to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty.

He says—

He further says:

The arbitrators, be it observed, do not say for the satisfaction of certain specific claims among those referred to the consideration of the tribunal, but of "all the claims" so referred conformably to the provisions of the treaty.

Other quotations might be added having an official or semi-official authority, but I presume they are unnecessary to establish the fact that this Government sought the award of a sum in gross in order that it alone might adjust and remove the claims and complaints of our own citizens by such distribution as would recompense actual sufferers from the depredations of the confederate cruisers.

Now, added to this fact there is the additional circumstance that this Government invited and received the various claims without discrimination, (and this may be readily inferred from all want of authority in the premises,) without any attempt on its part to pass upon the validity of the same or other idea than to make use of them in securing such recompense from Great Britain as would indemnify actual sufferers.

The efforts of this Government having been successful in securing the award in gross, it follows, according to my judgment, that a construction either of the language of the treaty or the various papers relating to the Geneva award are to a great degree immaterial, as the various claimants before this Congress are dependent and bound by the official acts and intent expressed by the executive department of the Government, so far at least as those acts may be regarded as in law or equity having any relation or bearing upon the deliberations or conclusions of this legislative branch of the same Government. But be this as it may, I have little apprehension that this House will find any difficulty in arriving at such decision as will be in conformity with strict justice toward those who may establish claims for actual losses.

The individual member of the committee who makes his report in favor of covering the money in controversy into the Treasury has indeed arrived at some conclusions which cannot be well denied. He claims with great propriety that the fund belongs to the Government, and that the people at large have been the sufferers from the circumstances which led to this payment by Great Britain; but upon a like theory we might exclude all claims upon the justice and fair dealing of this Government toward its citizens who have suffered in a direct and ascertainable manner by reason of their citizenship. It is no novelty in legal history that remote and consequential damages must often pass unliquidated and unpaid, even though substantial justice may be denied in so doing.

With these explanations concerning the object and result obtained from the treaty of Washington and its sequel of the Geneva conference, as well as the relations which claimants occupy toward this Government and the fund in question, the relative claims of the parties as I have classified them appear to my mind easily to be disposed of.

The claimants for losses sustained by acts of the exculpated cruisers possess all the merit of sufferers from actual damages sustained, and they appeal to us with a force which cannot be gainsaid or controverted, and in this respect their rights are equally as great and their equities perhaps even superior to those who come under the second subdivision of the report of the majority of the committee, known as claimants for the payment of war or enhanced premiums which they were subjected to by insurance companies by reason of the existence upon the high seas of confederate cruisers.

I am aware that it has been argued that those who paid the enhanced rates of insurance were re-imbursed in additional charges upon importations which went into the general consumption of the country. But a moment's reflection is sufficient to show the fallacy of such a theory. It could, in the first place, apply only to cargoes, and not at all to vessels which form the more important subject of insurance. Again, the importer or exporter in American bottoms was in direct competition with his neighbor, who employed the protection of a foreign flag, and how many secured this protection is the more easily understood by the falling off in our carrying trade to an extent that has left us scarcely an emblem of our former commercial greatness. If it is true that our importations rose rapidly in value at about the time when our merchants were subjected to enhanced premiums, that circumstance is rather to be attributed to the uncertainty in our monetary condition and to the increased duties to which our imports were subjected. The enhanced premiums were the direct result of the existence of confederate cruisers, and were submitted to by our merchants as a temporary necessity rather than that long years of established trade and intercourse might be destroyed and that such trade should pass exclusively into the hands of foreign dealers. They sought to avoid absolute ruin on the one hand at the expense of great loss on the other, until it may be fairly presumed they might receive indemnity from this Government.

The losses sustained by the claimants under the head of exculpated cruisers is altogether, I am credibly informed, in round numbers $1,000,000. The war premiums for which claimants seek re-imbursement amount to about the sum of $5,000,000.

If a further argument were needed to establish the validity of these claims known as war premiums, it is readily to be had in the fact that they have already been recognized in the construction placed by the court of commissioners of Alabama claims upon the twelfth section of the act of 1874 constituting that court, and already referred to. By the provisions of that section the insurance company or insurer was allowed compensation for losses sustained in respect to war risks (which were not limited to either class of cruisers) upon showing to the satisfaction of the court that such losses exceeded the premiums or gains in respect to such risks. By virtue of this provision and the other provisions of the act, all insurance companies which had suffered actual loss were allowed full indemnity for the same. This provision has been availed of by all the companies who had a right and title so to do, and the result is shown by judgments in their favor amounting to something less than $100,000.

In the calculation of these losses reference was had and allowances made for war premiums paid by companies for re-insurance. In the case of the Commercial Mutual Marine Insurance Company, of New Bedford, the sum paid for war premiums on its own risks re-insured in other companies was $2,041.57, which was allowed by the court and included in its judgment, and other instances to the same effect might be cited.

I am aware that it is contended with much earnestness by the insurance companies which are claimants for this fund that the claims for enhanced premiums were excluded from the award by reason of the action of the tribunal respecting the so-called indirect claims. There is in the history of almost every important treaty a secret or unwritten version, which only becomes public with the lapse of time and when the circumstances which called for it no longer exist; and after a careful perusal of all the circumstances with which we are favored connected with this treaty and the proceedings of the tribunal I am forced to the conviction that this treaty is no exception. For, taking Mr. Agent Davis's report relative to the presentation of the indirect claims, the motion of Lord Tenterden for the long adjournment having in view a supplementary or explanatory treaty, and the action of the tribunal in volunteering to exclude such claims without expressing or implying an opinion as to the interpretation or effect of the treaty upon the very matter of such claims in difference, and without a suggestion from either party for such action on the part of the tribunal, and the acquiescence by this Government, I can find no explanation or hypothesis satisfactory, except the existence of an understanding in the nature of an agreed case and decision, having for a principal object the payment of such a sum en bloc as would enable this Government to discharge all the legal claims of its citizens, whether or not strictly embraced in the treaty, which could necessarily only embrace subjects of international character.

The following is the language used by the arbitrators in passing upon the question of an adjournment, which I submit can only be explained, considering the eminent character of the men who composed the tribunal and surrounded it, except in the manner which I have suggested:

> The arbitrators do not propose to express or imply any opinion upon the point thus in difference between the two governments as to the interpretation or effect of the treaty; but it seems to them obvious that the substantial object of the adjournment must be to give the two governments an opportunity of determining whether the claims in question shall or shall not be submitted to the decision of the arbitrators, and that any difference between the two governments on this point may make the adjournment unproductive of any useful effect, and, after a delay of many months, during which both nations may be kept in a state of painful suspense, may end in a result which, it is to be presumed, both governments would equally deplore—that of making this arbitration wholly abortive. This being so, the arbitrators think it right to state that, after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or compensation of damages between nations, and should upon such principles be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide therein.

It will be observed that the tribunal held that as matters of international law these claims did not constitute good claims for award or compensation or computation of damages; and it will also be observed that Mr. Fish, in behalf of the President, accepted this result only as determinative of questions of public (i. e., international) law involved. Now, if we will observe the final decision and award, which is intended to cover the entire proceedings of the tribunal, including the ruling quoted, we perceive that, while direct reference is had to the other classes included in so-called indirect claims, no reference whatever is made to war premiums, unless covered by the term "double claims," and clearly thereby avoiding discrimination between claims of insurance companies and those held by the insured for enhanced premiums paid. This decision is arrived at in view of an equitable compensation for damages which have been sustained, and in the immediate context the arbitrators say that, in accordance with the spirit and letter of the treaty of Washington, they have preferred to make the adjudication in gross. How this sum was arrived at we have no information, for Mr. Agent Davis informs Mr. Fish that "the deliberations of the tribunal on the subject of damages were held with closed doors." And further on in Mr. Davis's report he says:

> The neutral arbitrators and Mr. Adams from the beginning of the proceedings were convinced of the policy of awarding a sum in gross. For some weeks before the decision was given I felt sure that the arbitrators would not consent to send the case to assessors until they should have exhausted all efforts to agree themselves upon the sum to be paid. Whether we have or have not been successful can be determined only by the final division of the sum.

In this report of Mr. Davis we find the term "sufferers," which, in my judgment, is the test to be applied to all these various claimants which are now before us. By the act of June 23, 1874, all insurance companies were provided compensation for losses from either exculpated or inculpated cruisers, and their various claims have been presented to the court constituted by that act and passed upon in conformity with its provisions, while at the same time we have information that the other insurance companies, who are now here as claimants, have been actually enriched by reason of their business in accepting the risks for which they were paid enhanced premiums to the extent of nearly $4,000,000.

These insurance companies therefore do not appear before us in the character of sufferers, but on the contrary as having been actually benefited.

As I understand this question, Mr. Speaker, it follows that the claim of the insurance companies as presented to us is either a naked legal right directly growing out of the treaty of Washington and the action of the Geneva tribunal or else depending upon principles of common law which we clearly recognize. As I have before observed and exhibited by the language of the treaty and the reports with reference to and the proceedings of that tribunal, they contain no basis whatever upon which such a claim can be predicated; and as their claim for damages has been exhausted by the act of June 23, 1874, I am unable to find but the further pretense of claims which these insurance companies present here in nature of assignees of those whose losses were paid by them, by virtue of which they claim to be subrogated to the rights of the parties who originally held them.

Let us observe the circumstances under which these claims on the part of the insurance companies were obtained. Instead of claiming by subrogation because of payment of losses sustained by the insured by the depredations of the inculpated cruisers in the usual and direct method, enhanced premiums having been first obtained, these insurance companies obtained upon payment of the losses an assignment from the losers of the amount which they paid them.

It is not for us to question the action of the sufferers who felt compelled to make this concession in order the more readily to obtain what was justly due them. Others circumstanced as they were, with perhaps their all at stake or involved, would have done the same, innocently referring it to a proper tribunal, such as we now constitute, to determine whether these companies by reason of such assignment obtained legal right to such payment as they now demand at our hands. No such right was contemplated by the original articles of insurance, and salvage, whatever might be its worth, is not preferred by the insurance companies in this case. Reclamation was not specified in the contract, and, if it had been, such a claim would have been valueless in the first instance against Great Britain, because no such claim could be tolerated for an instant, and negligence on the part of this Government has never been pretended.

The general law of subrogation which gives the surety the benefit of the position of his principal does not therefore by any intendment apply to this case either in more general law, as will be observed from the following letter, respecting the disposition of such cases on the part of Congress:

> COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.
> Executive Department, Boston, January 24, 1873.
> DEAR SIR: While I was on the Committee of Claims for six years several cases of insurance companies were presented where property had been lost or destroyed on which they had paid the insurance. The committee always dismissed the claim on the ground that they were paid for the risk and could not ask the Government to hold them harmless.

Yours, truly,

W. B. WASHBURN.

GEORGE O. SHATTUCK, Esq.

In brief, therefore, the assignment of these claims gave the companies only such rights as the assignors possessed; and the latter have been fully indemnified except for the enhanced premiums which they with others now here claim.

But there is yet a more enlarged view to be taken of this question of relative rights of claimants for this fund, a view which appeals to a patriotic sense of justice. It was a dark hour for our commerce when the confederate cruisers abroad upon the ocean highway intercepted and made havoc with our vessels and cargoes. The inducement to seek a foreign flag was great, and many years must elapse before that commerce which is our lawful right is restored to us. The few remained true to the flag in faith of its ultimate success and restoration of its power. These few were the ship-owners and merchants who ventured still abroad under its folds. How many of these went down in the financial disaster which followed will never be mentioned. Enormous rates of insurance, largely increased rates of freight, failures of insurance companies, disturbance in business arrangements, and delays in collecting insurance make up a partial list only of the difficulties under which our patriotic citizens suffered, while the other class of claimants which appear before us, as insurers, grew rich, as it were, out of the nation's distress. It appears to me that in this respect alone the conclusion is inevitable that to those who were "the sufferers," who sustained the nation's flag and the national honor, belongs the first and highest consideration not only in the past, but as a promise in the future to follow the example which has saved us the little which remains of the gallant merchant marine once a chief pride and resource of our country.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. If no other member desires to address the House I will move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eight o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. PIERCE: The petition of Harrison Loring, of Boston, Massachusetts, that the name of the steamship Whirlwind be changed to that of Arcadia, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SHEAKLEY: The petition of citizens and soldiers of Western Pennsylvania, for the passage of the bill equalizing the bounties of soldiers of the late war, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STEVENS: The petition of 131 citizens of Arizona Territory, for a post-route from Greaterville to Tucson, in said Territory, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of Kirkland, Chase & Co. and others, of Baltimore, Maryland, for the passage of the bill now pending in the House relating to the distribution of the balance of the Geneva award fund, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania: Remonstrance of D. Trainer & Sons, Charles Hill, Verlinden Brothers, Jacob S. Terrill, and 91 other manufacturers and workingmen of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, against the reduction of import duties on foreign goods which enter into competition with their respective manufactures, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 16, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 26th of April last, transmitting a copy of a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, relating to claims upon which judgments have been rendered or that may be now pending before the court of commissioners of Alabama claims arising from captures by the rebel cruiser Shenandoah; which, on motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 332) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874.

The amendment of the House was to add at the end of the bill:

That section 5108 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the time of the legislative session for the reception of morning business? The Chair hears no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of Mary M. Berry, mother of Lieutenant James W. Berry, late of Company H, One hundred and sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services rendered by her son during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. I give notice that to-morrow, or the next legislative day thereafter, I shall ask the consideration of the bill by the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I present an amendment to the bill making appropriations for the Indian service just reported by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] and I move that it be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, pursuant to order the legislative and executive business will be suspended and the Senate will proceed to consider the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 16, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

WALLABOUT BAY, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Mr. WILLIS. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask consent to report back at this time, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 7) to provide for the sale or exchange of a certain piece of land in the Wallabout Bay, in the State of New York, to the city of Brooklyn. I will state that the objections made on a previous occasion to this bill have been withdrawn.

The preamble and bill were read, as follows:

Whereas the United States Government owns certain lands in the city of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, that are unoccupied, are partly under water, and are not needed for Government use; and whereas the city of Brooklyn is without an available site for a public market for the accommodation of its inhabitants, and has appealed to its Representatives in Congress to secure a site for such building on the lands of the United States at Wallabout Bay: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to organize a commission of five members, two of whom he shall name, two of whom shall be the mayor and the comptroller of the city of Brooklyn, and the fifth member to be selected by the four above mentioned. The commission when organized shall proceed to arrange equitable terms, conditions, and considerations for the conveyance to the city of Brooklyn of all that certain piece or parcel of land partly under water situate in Wallabout Bay, in the State of New York, and bounded and described as follows: Beginning at the intersection of the northerly side of Flushing avenue with the westerly side of Washington avenue; running thence westerly along the northerly side of Flushing avenue five hundred and sixty feet to the westerly side of Clinton avenue; thence northerly in a straight line in continuation of the westerly line of Clinton avenue sixteen hundred and fifty feet to tide-water; thence easterly along the water-front to the westerly side of Washington avenue; and thence southerly along the westerly side of Washington avenue fourteen hundred and seventy five feet to the point or place of beginning, be any or all of the said several dimensions more or less; the land being bounded on the north by Wallabout Bay, on the east by Washington avenue, on the south by Flushing avenue, and on the west by Clinton avenue.

SEC. 2. That when the commission, or a majority of its members, shall have agreed on the consideration, terms, and conditions of sale, the Secretary of the Navy shall make, execute, and deliver to the city of Brooklyn a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of the land above described, as soon as the terms agreed upon shall have been complied with.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs was to the second section, to insert before the words "the Secretary of the Navy" the words "they shall report their conclusions to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall lay them before Congress at the beginning of its next session, and if Congress shall ratify the same and authorize it to be done."

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no doubt this measure is right, but I reserve the right to object. I wish to hear the reading of the paper sent to the Clerk's desk. I must object to any measure passing this House until we can understand what it is.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will permit this bill to pass. I think it will be a blessing to the citizens of the city of Brooklyn to have this swamp filled up in some way with buildings.

Mr. HOLMAN. If gentlemen insist on the passage of a bill through the House without anybody understanding it, I shall have to object peremptorily. I am only asking now, reserving the right to object, to have the paper read at the Clerk's desk. I object to business being presented in such a manner that no member can know what is its nature. I ask the paper be read. I have no doubt it is right, but I wish to understand it.

SIOUX INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. BOONE. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to have entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes, was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be entered.

Mr. BOONE. I will call it up hereafter.

WALLABOUT BAY, BROOKLYN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What paper does the gentleman from Indiana wish to have read?

Mr. HOLMAN. The paper which was being read at the time I took the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk was then reading the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; then I call for the rereading of the bill so we can understand what it is we are called to vote upon.

The bill was again read.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question for information. I desire to have the bill passed. Let me ask him whether this is to be a sale of a public nature in any way?

Mr. WILLIS. The terms of the sale are to be agreed upon by commissioners, and they are to report their conclusions to Congress at the next session for ratification.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think the fairest way to do it is by public sale, as was done in the case of the sale of the old Philadelphia navy-yard. I make the suggestion with a view to help to perfect the bill. I think there should be some member of the municipality of Brooklyn on that commission, some officer of the city having charge of taxation. We had, for instance, in the Philadelphia navy-yard sale the chairman of the board of revision of taxes on the commission. There may be arrived at then almost the absolute value of the property to be sold. I only wish to see the Government get the full value of this property at a fair public sale. It will be a great blessing to that part of Brooklyn and Williamsburgh to have this marsh land filled up and covered with buildings.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I entertain very serious doubts about the wisdom of selling this land. It seems to me in the highest degree improbable it can be for the interest of the United States to sell this property. I have never known any great corporation, I have never known any railroad or any other corporation which required the use of any considerable amount of land, which ever obtained the amount of land they needed. In the process of time the business they are engaged in develops the want of a great deal more land than they have.

It is now proposed we should discontinue the navy-yards in New England mainly, and that we should concentrate all the business of building ships and repairing ships belonging to the United States in two or three navy-yards. If that is so, it is very remarkable we should want to part with this land.

But whether that be so or not, there is another thing I am sure is wrong in regard to this bill. It is certainly not right this bill should provide, in determining the amount to be paid for this land, for the selection of two appraisers from the city of Brooklyn; that the mayor and comptroller of the city of Brooklyn should be put upon the board to determine the amount of money the city of Brooklyn should pay for the land in question. Who has ever heard of a case where you selected as judges to decide between two parties the parties themselves? Yet that is what is being done by this bill. You not only select four independent, honest men who have no interest in the matter in question to decide the amount to be paid, but you select the mayor and comptroller of the city of Brooklyn as the parties to decide how much the city of Brooklyn should pay. Is that the way to determine the honest and fair value of this land? Who ever heard of selecting as judges parties to the matter? They really are the parties, as the mayor and comptroller of the city of Brooklyn represent the city, and you really leave it to the city to say how much the city shall pay.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have never known in the little experience I have had in the sale of lands in the State of New York we ever selected the purchasers to determine the value of the property to be sold. Gentlemen say on the other side, here are two other gentlemen selected by the Government. Very well; that is right; but there should be four selected by the Government—four intelligent, disinterested men, who should determine the value of this property. But the gentleman who introduced this bill tells us it has to come back to this House at the next session of Congress and we are to ratify it. That is so. It is to come back here. But what evidence will we have when it comes back of the value of this property except the report of this commission? Do we go behind their report to see what the value of this property is? Not at all. We have to depend entirely upon that report; and that report is made by two men who are interested in making the amount as small as possible, other two who may perhaps be independent men, and the fifth to be appointed by these four.

I desire to amend this bill by striking out the words "two of whom shall be the mayor and comptroller of the city of Brooklyn," and inserting in their place the names of Elbridge G. Spaulding of Buffalo, late treasurer of the State of New York, and George Geddes, of Onondaga, both gentlemen of high intelligence and unimpeachable character. I object to its being left to the mayor and comptroller of the city of Brooklyn to say how much Brooklyn shall pay for this property.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire still to reserve the right of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must see that it is very anomalous to carry the bill along in this way, without determining whether it is before the House for consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the provision of the bill in regard to the persons who shall make this appraisal shall be again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order. There is a great confusion in the House to-day, owing to circumstances unnecessary for the Chair to mention. The Clerk will read the portion of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to organize a commission of five members, two of whom he shall name, two of whom shall be the mayor and the comptroller of the city of Brooklyn, and the fifth member to be selected by the four above named.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest this amendment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS:] That the commission shall consist of the mayor of the city of Brooklyn and three to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, making a commission of four.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that a vote be taken on that amendment. I am not authorized to accept any amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] suggests that there is no good reason for the mayor of the city of Brooklyn being on the commission; and there certainly seems to be an impropriety in that. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] who has this measure in charge that the commission be composed of three persons, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will regard the bill as being before the House for consideration, no objection being made. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires to offer an amendment, which he will send to the desk in writing.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been suggested that the appointment should be made by the head of the Government, instead of by the head of a Department. I therefore suggest that the bill be amended so as to read, that the President of the United States shall nominate a commission of three persons.

Mr. FORT. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] who has charge of the bill whether the city of Brooklyn has ever memorialized Congress or applied to the Government to purchase this land?

Mr. WILLIS. It has; and I would respond to the gentleman from Indiana by informing him that all parties are in favor of this measure. The press and the occupants of the Government, republican and democratic, favor it, and believe that the public interests will be served by it.

Mr. FORT. I do not know what republicans or democrats, as such, have to do with the matter.

Mr. WILLIS. Everybody is in favor of it.

Mr. BLISS. The bill now under consideration is one which I introduced early in the session. The reason why we have tried this morning to bring it before the House for action is because we feared that the Committee on Naval Affairs might not be called again this session.

I have no wish to detain the House by making any extended explanation; but I desire to say that I ask on behalf of over 500,000 people that this bill shall pass. This land has never been used by the Government since it was ceded by the city of Brooklyn to the Government. It was not used during the war, and there is no probability that it will be used for the next fifty years. We do not want this land for nothing. We want to pay for it all that it is worth, and it may be double what it is worth.

I do not care who the commissioners are, provided their appointment is not made in such a way as to defeat the object of the bill. I do not care whether the appointment be made by the President of the United States or by the Secretary of the Navy, or whether private individuals be named in the bill. But I think that by appointing the mayor of the city of Brooklyn, who is a republican, and the comptroller, who is a democrat, and the Secretary of the Navy appointing two others, and those four agreeing upon a fifth, a fair conclusion would be arrived at. The gentleman from Indiana, as I understand, proposes that the President shall name the commission. If such is the wish of the House, I do not desire to oppose that proposition. Still, I must submit that the proposition contained in the bill is a fair one, and I should like to have a vote taken upon it.

In my judgment, the passage of this bill is of the utmost importance, not only to the people of the city of Brooklyn and of Long Island, but it is equally so to the Government itself. The object of the bill is to enable the city of Brooklyn to acquire title to those marshy and overflowed lands of the United States adjoining its navy-yard at that point for the purpose of erecting a public market thereon, which shall combine the advantages of a central location and the indispensable requisite of a suitable water front.

It is proposed on behalf of the city that a full equivalent shall be paid for the land desired either in cash or by the exchange of other land adjoining the navy-yard equally if not more valuable for navy-yard purposes. The bill provides that the precise terms or conditions of the sale or exchange shall be determined by a commission to be appointed for that purpose.

Those unacquainted with the city of Brooklyn will be surprised at being informed that the third city in the Union, with its 500,000 inhabitants and its rapidly increasing population, is to-day without the conveniences of a public market. Such, however, is the case.

From its incorporation as a city until the present time Brooklyn has been without adequate market facilities, and has depended upon the markets of the city of New York for its supplies.

The farmers and other producers of Long Island, because of this absence of a public market in Brooklyn, are forced to transport their produce across the river to the markets of New York; and this produce, having been conveyed past its natural market, is then brought back to Brooklyn for consumption in that city at an increased price, and damaged by the unnecessary transportation.

The citizens of Brooklyn have suffered this inconvenience year after year, and up to this time have been unable to obtain relief because no fit location with proper water-front facilities could be obtained. Earnest endeavors have been made to discover some other satisfactory location, but they have been uniformly unsuccessful.

These lands, although so desirable to the city of Brooklyn for the purposes mentioned, are of comparatively little value to the United States Government, inasmuch as they are marshy and overflowed, and have remained almost entirely unused by the Government. They were not necessary for Government purposes during the last war, when the navy-yard at that place was worked to its utmost capacity, and it is not likely that the Government will ever require the land for any purpose whatever. Indeed, it is even probable that before many years the entire navy-yard will be removed to some other point, where it will not interfere with the business growth or commercial prosperity of a great city.

Some members of the present Congress may recollect that a few years since a bill was introduced having for its object the removal of the Brooklyn yard, alleging as reasons therefor that so much water-front was monopolized by its use and that its being located so centrally prevented improvements in that section of the city. It is believed by many that if the question of its removal were left to the decision of the citizens of Brooklyn a large majority in favor of its removal would be found.

I mention these facts not because I desire to urge any arguments for its removal, but to show that the general sentiment of the citizens of Brooklyn is that the navy-yard in its present location, with the outlying lands attached to it, is a restriction upon the commerce of the city, a real detriment to its advancement. The Government, under these circumstances, ought not to be unwilling to make this trifling concession to that city.

It is perhaps proper to state here, as I remarked before the committee, that in the infancy of Brooklyn the navy-yard was on its northern limits, where the overflowed and marsh lands ran in an easterly direction, dividing what was then known as the cities of Brooklyn and Williamsburgh, and seemed to forbid the growth of the city in that direction. Since then those municipalities, together with other interior settlements, have all been consolidated and now form one city. The enterprise and industry of its inhabitants have pushed improvements across the marshy lands wherever owned by the city until it is found that the outlying lands of the United States adjoining the navy-yard are actual obstacles in the way of commerce in their present condition, and prevent further improvements needed for the relief of the inhabitants.

The present bill provides for the sale of only a very small portion of these outlying Government lands, with a water front of some two hundred feet, after which there will still remain to the United States fully three thousand feet of water front (the entire navy-yard proper) and a large section of unimproved and unused land.

The importance of having a public market located somewhere on these lands is considered of such vital consequence that men of all parties, the entire press of the city, and the neighboring communities unite in asking the General Government to cede this land to the city. The board of aldermen and the board of supervisors have urged their Representatives in Congress from that city by resolutions to try and secure this much-needed relief for the city of Brooklyn.

To meet these wishes of the people negotiations were opened with the Navy Department by the officials of Brooklyn about a year ago having that object in view. A proposition was made to exchange certain lands with the United States, but the negotiation failed because the consent and authority of Congress had not been obtained.

As I observed before the Naval Committee, the advocates of this measure invite the closest scrutiny. A fair and equitable transaction is all that is contemplated; so that, while the city of Brooklyn will secure a much-needed relief for its inhabitants, the Government will not fail to receive ample compensation therefor.

Another reason why it will benefit the Government is that in addition to receiving full consideration for land in an unimproved condition, which is useless to it and virtually not needed, its remaining lands will be greatly enhanced in value on account of the improvements which will be made on the portion ceded.

I have said there could be no reasonable opposition to selling these lands; and there is no opposition except from a few of the old line officers of the Navy, whose theory is that the Government should hold on to all it gets, especially where the Navy Department is interested, and that the necessities of the people should not in any case enter into the question. But even this opposition is confined to a few, and I do not imagine that this House—directly representing the people—will refuse its assent to so reasonable a request as is proposed in this measure upon any such consideration.

I have thus briefly stated the reasons why this bill has been introduced, its object and provisions, the benefits to be derived, and the necessities which call for its passage.

The committee to whom it was referred have, I believe, thoroughly investigated its merits, and some gentlemen of the committee have visited the location in person to satisfy themselves that the Government can make the transfer of the land in question without detriment to its interests. From the investigations they have made I believe they are fully satisfied that the Government can dispose of the property without the slighest disadvantage.

In conclusion, I ask the House to consider the great benefit which the passage of the bill will confer upon the people of Brooklyn and Long Island, the little use, if any, which the Government has for the property, and the actual advantage which the United States will derive from its sale, in addition to receiving full compensation therefor. I trust the House will carefully weigh the arguments I have advanced in support of this meritorious measure and assent to its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words: "That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to organize a commission of five members, two of whom he shall name, two of whom shall be the mayor and the comptroller of the city of Brooklyn, and the fifth member to be selected by the four above mentioned."

And insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to organize a commission of three members.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment, it was agreed to.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES RICHARDSON.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3155) for the relief of James Richardson, late a private in Company E, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, and moved that the Committee on War Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

TARRONUNCE KIRBY.

Mr. EDEN also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back papers relating to the claim of Tarrounce Kirby, of Sumner County, Tennessee, and moved that the Committee on War Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Judiciary a couple of bills that relate to the District of Columbia. It is desirable that they should pass without delay, and I think there can be no objection to them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object; but I shall not object to the introduction of bills for reference.

MARTHA N. DAVIS.

Mr. FAULKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R.

No. 3737) for the relief of Martha N. Davis, of the county of Jefferson, State of West Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ALBERT VAN STEINHAUSEN.

Mr. HARRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3738) for the relief of Albert Van Steinhausen, late lieutenant-colonel of the Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying memorial, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and the bill ordered to be printed.

HENRY PLOWMAN.

Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2128) for the relief of Henry Plowman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLOTHING, ETC., FOR THE SIGNAL CORPS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a report showing the amount expended during the past fiscal year for clothing, &c., for the Signal corps; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I promise the committee the merit of brevity, if my remarks shall possess no other.

The bill making appropriations for the Army for the next fiscal year has been maturely considered by the committee in charge of it. Every available source of authentic information has been consulted, that no injury should be done this important branch of the public service.

It will be remembered that a bill some months since was reported to this House by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, entitled "An act to regulate the pay and allowances of Army officers," which after considerable discussion passed this House and is now pending in the Senate. This bill reduced the pay and allowances of the General, the Lieutenant-General, the major-generals, and the brigadier-generals.

The bill now before the House has been made to conform in many respects to the provisions of that bill, and also to another bill to promote the efficiency of the Army, which was reported by the same committee and passed. I refer now to House bill No. 2935.

In the adjustment of the salaries of the general officers the Committee on Appropriations did not descend in the scale of reduction to the basis of the Banning bill. That bill fixed the salary of the General at $10,000 per annum; we have left it at $12,000. So with the Lieutenant-General the salary was fixed at $8,000; we make it $9,000. A reduction, exclusive of allowances in the first instance, of $1,500; in the second a reduction of $2,000. As both of these offices expire with the death or resignation of their present incumbents, it was deemed advisable not to reduce them any lower, as it might have the appearance of personality. In the case of the major-generals, this bill advanced over the rate of the other bill to $7,000 instead of $6,000. We also fixed the salaries of brigadiers at $5,500 instead of $5,000. These rates of pay were considered to correspond with the grades in rank; the longevity pay of officers of the line bringing up their pay in corresponding proportion. For instance, a colonel's pay is $3,500; his longevity pay finally advances his salary to $4,500, and a lieutenant-colonel's from $3,000 to $4,000.

In section 3 of this bill one abuse is corrected which of late has become very prevalent among Army officers and others high in authority. Such subordinate officers who may be so fortunate as to be personal and political favorites with the commanding general, or who may have a friend at court, who may be not without influence with the war minister or the President, are often detailed from the duty of sharing the privations and hardships of their regiment on duty in the camp or field to discharge some civic duty or to take position upon some general's staff surrounded by the comforts and elegancies of city headquarters, with additional pay and allowances over and above the pay and allowances of his rank, while other officers, older in the service and doubtless more meritorious, have been passed by or assigned to duty on the frontiers with less pay. This practice is regarded in the Army with suspicion, and is looked upon as an unjust discrimination which is demoralizing to the service. In the Army, merit and the length of service alone should be the test of promotion; personal favoritism, never.

Section 4 abolishes the adjutants and quartermasters, who were made extra lieutenants by the act of July 28, 1866.

Section 5 limits the service of chaplains in the Army to four years, but does not prohibit their re-appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This change is manifestly desirable.

Section 7 provides for a court of inquiry and courts-martial, dispensing with the more expensive form of having a judge-advocate and a court of military justice.

Section 8 requires the appointments to the rank of second lieutenant to be made from the Military Academy and from the enlisted men or non-commissioned officers. This I regard as an important reform, for the reason that it helps to keep up the esprit de corps of the enlisted men, excites their military pride and aspiration by being placed directly in the line of promotion. No outside or political or personal favoritism can defeat the just reward of obedience and soldierly conduct.

Section 9 requires that post-traders shall hereafter be appointed by the Secretary of War on the recommendation of the council of administration and the approval of the commanding general, thus dividing the responsibility of those appointments. This reform I think will readily commend itself to the House without argument. Recent events would seem to justify it, if not require it.

Section 10, among other things, provides that the paymasters shall be reduced from fifty to forty in number by dropping the junior commissions. I do not undertake to say that forty are enough to do the work efficiently. It is proper for me to add that the Paymaster-General thinks forty not enough. But the Military Committee, and especially its gallant and able chairman, insists that the reduction to forty should be made. I am free to say that if the House should go up to forty-five I should not regard it as extravagant. But in connection with this Pay Department I wish to call the attention of the House and of the War Department to the rather singular fact that the disbursements in the Paymaster's Department increase over a half million of dollars every year. I herewith append the following table showing the disbursements to the regular Army by the Pay Department during the fiscal years 1860 and 1871, and the disbursements chargeable to the appropriations for the fiscal years 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875:

NOTES.—Prior to the fiscal year 1871 the disbursements for items 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 were made by the Quartermaster-General's Department.

Included in the disbursements for 1871 is the amount (one year's pay and allowances) paid to officers leaving the Army under act of July 15, 1870.

The amounts stated as disbursements chargeable to fiscal year 1875, under items 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, are for eleven and a half months' service. One-half month's pay, say $500,000, is due and not paid, owing to a deficiency in the amount appropriated for the service of said year. The disbursements in 1875 under item 11 are not "mileage," but "actual traveling expenses" of officers, exclusive of amount paid by the Quartermaster's Department on transportation orders, which form an item of these expenses.

BENJ. ALVORD,
Paymaster-General United States Army.

FEBRUARY 29, 1876.

Section 11 provides that hereafter officers shall be allowed eight cents per mile instead of ten cents for distances actually traveled. This sum is doubtless sufficient. In reference to the reduction proposed in this bill of the commutation for officers' quarters, I desire to state that the reduction of the allowance of $18 per month for each room to $12 per month was made at the earnest solicitation of the chairman of the Military Committee. The bill regulating allowances to officers, reported by the Military Committee, reduced the pay to $12, and this committee has only conformed to that amount. If the sum allowed is not enough, the Military Committee must shoulder the responsibility. This committee has no disposition whatever to reduce the compensation of the officers of the Army below a comfortable and respectable living.

Returning to section 6 of the bill, two important changes present themselves. First, sections 1104 and 1108 of the Revised Statutes are herein repealed, which provide that the Ninth and Tenth Regiments of cavalry and the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Regiments of infantry shall be recruited exclusively of colored men. This bill is constructed upon the hypothesis that no discriminations under the law should be made between the white and colored race on account of color. As the right and privilege to join the Army of the United States belongs to any citizen who is not liable to prescribed disabilities, of course these statutes discriminating in favor of colored people are repugnant to the principles of equality and to the theory and teachings of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. Besides this view of their incompatibility, do not those statutes in effect declare that the strong arm of the law must be used by special application and class legislation to place the colored men in the Army at the expense of their claims to manhood and equal merit as soldiers? Under that view, do the colored men desire this class legislation, which in the one case stamps them as inferiors under the law, while in the other it would for their protection seem to do violence to their equality under the Constitution? In either case, it occurs to me that the removal of this discrimination would be desirable from their stand-point.

But to do justice to my own views I must say that I am influenced in my action, (and I believe I can say about as much for the majority of the Committee on Appropriations,) not by any political considerations in the advocacy of this change in the laws, but altogether by economic reasons.

It has been found by actual experiment and comparison that colored troops cost much more than white ones. In the first place it costs more to recruit colored troops than white ones, for the reason that the colored man does not like the life of a soldier as well a white man does. It takes more time to recruit a given number of the former than it does the latter, and of course at greater expense. In fact, I am informed by Army officers that it is now difficult to induce colored men to join the Army at all in any reasonable numbers. Its restraints and discipline do not suit their ideas of freedom.

Nor are they as efficient soldiers, especially in cavalry and frontier service. The death rate among them is also greater than among white soldiers.

It is foreign altogether to my purpose to attempt any explanation of the facts. Suffice it, they are authenticated by Army records and by still more convincing evidence, the increased sums of money which are required to maintain colored troops over and above the amounts which are necessary to keep the same number of white soldiers in the field.

But for fear some one may suppose that I am speaking from prejudice—and that I have any undue antipathy toward the colored man, I utterly deny; upon the contrary, I have every disposition to help him—I desire to refer the House to the letter of General Bingham addressed to myself in answer to verbal inquiries on this subject:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1876.

SIR: In compliance with the verbal request you made of me on the 7th instant, the day I was directed to meet the Committee on Appropriations at the War Department, I have the honor to submit herewith a statement, hastily prepared from the records, showing the difference in cost of remounting, clothing, and providing hired labor for white and colored troops:

The Ninth and Tenth Cavalry and Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry are colored. All other regiments are composed of white troops. The Fourth, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Regiments of cavalry and Tenth, Twenty-fourth, and Twenty-fifth infantry were stationed in the same part of the country during the period covered by the statement.

The average strength of the cavalry regiments during the years 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875 was as follows: Fourth, 730 enlisted men; Eighth, 795 enlisted men; Ninth, 671 enlisted men; Tenth, 775 enlisted men. Total number of white men, 1,585; total number of colored men, 1,446.

The number of horses purchased for each regiment during the five years was as follows: Fourth, 890 horses; Eighth, 762 horses; Ninth, 761 horses; Tenth, 1,004 horses. Total number of horses purchased for 1,585 white men, 1,652; total number purchased for 1,446 colored men, 1,965. Excess for the two colored regiments having 193 men less than the two white regiments, 313.

The scouting and field service of each regiment during the five years was as follows: Fourth, 23 months; Eighth, 27 months; Ninth, 10 months; Tenth, 17 months.

The two white regiments were engaged in such service 5½ months in the five years, or an average of 10 months per year. The two colored regiments were on such service 27 months in the same time, or an average of 5¼ months per year.

Scouting and field service are the principal legitimate causes of the loss of horses, rendering remounts necessary.

The average cost of horses during the five years was $127.40 each. The average cost of remounting a white soldier was $132.78; the same average for a colored soldier was $173.12½; showing that it cost $40.34 more per year to remount a colored soldier than a white one.

Horses for remounting the 1,585 white soldiers cost $210,464.80 in five years; horses for remounting 1,446 colored soldiers during the same time cost $250,341.00.

The cost of remounting a number of colored soldiers equal in number to the white would be $274,403.12, an excess in cost in five years of $63,938.32, or $12,787.66 per year. But the scouting and field service being an important element in considering the case, it may be assumed that the less actively employed regiments, with equal management, should have broken down and lost fewer horses and cost less for remounts.

The average cost of clothing furnished to the Eighth Cavalry in 1875 was $46.58 per man. The average cost of clothing furnished to the Ninth Cavalry during the same year was $54.09 per man, being an excess of $7.51 per man. The cost of clothing furnished during that year to 609 men of the Ninth Cavalry exceeded that furnished to an equal number of the Eighth Cavalry by $4,578.59.

It is found necessary to hire more citizens as clerks, mechanics, &c., in connection with the colored troops than the white. The companies of a regiment are usually distributed among several posts, and it is difficult to make a comparison of the cost under this item. Mounted and foot, white and colored troops are frequently found at the same post.

Fort Clark, Texas, was garrisoned by white troops, the Fourth Cavalry and Tenth Infantry, during the year ending June 30, 1874, with the exception of three months when the garrison was increased by one company of colored infantry. The amount furnished per company from "incidental expenses" for payment for hired citizen labor during that year was $331.92. During the same year Forts Brown and Davis and Ringgold Barracks were garrisoned by colored troops, namely: Ninth Cavalry and Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry. These companies were furnished an average of $576.80 each from incidental expenses for payment for hired citizen labor.

From this it appears that the hire of citizen labor for colored troops costs $244.88 more per company than for white troops. For a cavalry regiment this would amount to $2,938.56, and for infantry to $2,448.80.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. BINGHAM,
Deputy Quartermaster-General,
Brevet Brigadier-General United States Army.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
Member of Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

These colored regiments are far from being full, and cannot be kept near the maximum. These facts leave no doubt as to the wisdom of the action of the committee from economic considerations, to say nothing of the efficiency and vigor of the service. This change, in the judgment of the committee, is a real reform, and as such they do not hesitate to commend it cordially to the House.

I have no respect for any sickly sentimentalism born of prejudice on either side of this question. The negro has been made the equal of the white man before the law, and he who agitates the issue now settled on either side for political and partisan ends is a pestiferous demagogue, whose patriotism is sacrificed on the altar of self-aggrandizement or to the Moloch of party. The statesman should ignore the issue, and treat the question from the stand-point of justice and a sound economy.

The other feature of this bill which may elicit an honest difference of opinion is the reduction of the Army. With the exception of Alaska Territory, we have no more territory now than we had in 1860. Then there were more Indians than there are now, and a much larger proportion of them were wild and unfriendly. Then, too, the Government had trouble with the Mormons of Utah, which required a considerable military force to prevent outbreaks and preserve the lives and property of the people. The Army consisted in 1858–'60 of 14,000 non-commissioned officers and enlisted men. The following table will show the cost of the Army in the years 1858–'60 and 1873–'75:

Army appropriations, from Army law, including only what is in bill for this year.

For 14,000 troops:
1857–'58	$12,230,040 73
1858–'59	15,222,266 14
1859–'60	13,647,325 28
For 30,000 troops:
1872–'73	27,501,393 32
1873–'74	30,396,008 81
1874–'75	27,698,500 00

The reductions proposed by this bill are as follows:

The estimates for the Army for 1877 are	$33,697,148 00
The amount appropriated by this bill is	23,155,077 12
Reduction below the estimate	10,532,040 88
Secretary Taft revised the estimate and reduced it over	5,000,000 00
Amount appropriated for 1876, ending June 30	27,933,830 00
Amount appropriated by this bill for 1877 is	23,155,077 12
Reduction below appropriation of 1876	4,778,758 88

The present force of 2,168 commissioned officers and 25,000 enlisted men is distributed at one hundred and seventy-one posts, exclusive of arsenals, seventy-two of which are west of the Mississippi River and two in Alaska Territory.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is showing the reduction this year from the appropriations made last year?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice in the bill a number of re-appropriations, and I would inquire of the gentleman what they amount to?

Mr. ATKINS. They amount to something less than a million of dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. Then really the reduction is a million less than you have stated.

Mr. ATKINS. The amount of re-appropriations is something less than a million of dollars.

Mr. RANDALL. What is that point made by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FOSTER. There are in this bill a number of re-appropriations of unexpended balances.

Mr. RANDALL. I can explain that.

Mr. FOSTER. The point I make is that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] stated that the reduction this year amounts to $4,778,000. Now you propose to re-appropriate by this bill a million of dollars of unexpended balances, and I thought the amount was a million and a half, and I suggest to him that he should state, if he desires to be entirely accurate, that these re-appropriations should be deducted.

Mr. RANDALL. I will tell the House what is the reduction of the expenditures during the current year and those that it is designed to give the next fiscal year preceding the current year. The pay of the Army in the appropriation bill of last year was $11,400,000, which was arbitrarily reduced to the extent of $900,000 by the Committee on Appropriations. The Department found itself this year deficient $900,000 upon the Army pay; I might go further back, and say that the deficiency in the year prior to that in the Army pay was $500,000, which this Congress has provided for, and in this bill the amount appropriated is made so large that there will be no contingency in which any soldier of this country, either officer or private, shall be for two weeks without pay, as they were in the last two weeks of June last, or without pay for a month, as they would have been but for the interposition of this Congress. We give in this bill the full amount necessary for the pay of the Army, whereas Congress at its last session gave $900,000 too little, and in the prior year there was a deficiency of $500,000.

It is no more than fair, therefore, that when we come to make a comparison between the appropriations of this year and the appropriations of last year that $900,000, which was improperly and arbitrarily cast out of the appropriations, should not be made to count against us. Therefore, in order to make the thing even and just in the comparison between the two years, it should be stated that we re-appropriated $900,000, or thereabouts, for this purpose. The reductions in fact are as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will remember that the Committee on Appropriations paid $500,000 of this $900,000 deficiency by a re-appropriation; so that the appropriations of last year after all were nearly $2,000,000 in excess of what was actually needed.

Mr. RANDALL. All I desire to say is that these are the reductions fairly and conclusively established, because you omitted to appropriate money enough to pay the Army by $900,000, and they must have known or ought to have known it at the time. This Congress says that every dollar necessary to pay the Army, both officers and privates, must be appropriated, and it has been appropriated in this bill. Therefore, at the end of this year, there will be a different position of things from what there has been for two years past. There will be money enough in the Treasury to pay every soldier, whereas there was a deficiency of $500,000 for the year ending June 30, 1875, and a deficiency of $900,000 for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that alters the statement at all.

Mr. ATKINS. I think my colleague on the committee from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has fully answered my colleague from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] on that point.

The reduction of the Army since the war has been going on gradually. In view of the pomp and splendor so recently investing the Army, and in view, too, of the magnitude of its operations and the immense forces it contained, any sudden and radical reduction to a low peace basis has been avoided. The act of July 28, 1866, reduced the Army to forty-five regiments of infantry and ten regiments of cavalry, and the act of 1872 reduced it to 30,000. The last Congress reduced it from 30,000 enlisted men to 25,000. The bill under consideration proposes a still further reduction to 22,000 enlisted men. Now, as the statistics show that an American soldier costs about $1,200 per annum, the reduction of 3,000 men at that rate would be a saving of $3,600,000 yearly. If the soldier costs only $1,000 per annum, then it amounts to a saving of $3,000,000.

When we remember that our receipts from all sources for the present fiscal year fall short of our expenditures by $12,000,000, and that the next fiscal year bids fair for us to realize even a still greater diminution in our revenues, is it not worthy of our serious inquiry whether this saving can be dispensed with with safety to the general administration of the Government?

With the present decay in our commerce and the gloomy outlook which everywhere obscures our business and financial horizon, the Committee on Appropriations felt the pressure and demand for retrenchment in expenditures. One of two things was apparent; we either had to reduce expenditures so as to meet the diminished revenues, or the Committee of Ways and Means would be forced to levy additional taxation upon the people.

The reductions in the ordinary expenditures already made by the House and the additional reductions proposed by the Committee on Appropriations amount in the grand aggregate to $38,000,000.

With the unfavorable prospects which forebode our revenues for the next fiscal year, may not these reductions seem to the chancellor of the exchequer during the coming year very timely and fortunate? Prudent men always graduate their expenses to their income, and governments should do likewise.

Now, if the Army can be reduced still further without impairing its efficiency or subjecting the frontier settlements to exposure and the danger incident to border life, it certainly is an economic measure to do so. Properly distributed upon the frontiers, it does seem that all reasonable protection ought to be afforded upon the basis of twenty-two thousand men.

The idea of a large standing Army is un-American and anti-republican. It is the outgrowth, and necessity in fact, of the strong monarchial governments of Europe. The petty ambition of rival houses, sometimes developing into fierce political revolutions, have for centuries swept over those countries with the fury of the hurricane, devastating their fair fields in all the ruin which follows in the train of long and bloody wars, until the budgets of national debt have swelled to proportions mountain high; and now national debts and standing armies have become through a singular process of political economy mutually supportive and protective of each other. The two together have covered those countries with distressing taxes, built up landed and moneyed aristocracies, reduced the great mass of the people through generations for centuries back to a mere peasantry—tenants at the will of a few royal families. The rich, gathering their tithes and rentals from the toiling millions, whom tyranny and taxation have reduced to submission, contribute liberally of the proceeds of others' labor to government, while government in turn furnishes the power, the military force, to continue and support the system of national spoliation and plunder of the great laboring masses though the process of tithes, rents, and other laws regulating the relations of landlord and tenant. Thus it is that practically the liberties of the people have been crushed through the unholy alliance of the purse and the sword.

I have no prejudice originating in sectional memories against the regular Army—not the slightest. Whatever we have I would keep up to the highest standard of modern equipment and appointment. Every measure necessary to maintain its esprit de corps and efficiency I would adopt regardless of reasonable expenditure, so that the American soldier or officer should feel that his Government invested him with something more than the character of its defender. I would have them feel that their Government cared for their wants, pensioned their crippled, provided for them in declining years, perpetuated their names and deeds upon imperishable stone and unfading parchment, and crowned the true and the brave with its first honors, and embalmed them in the heart-affections of its citizens. All this I feel as an American citizen.

But of what use is a standing army in this country further than to keep the Indians in subjection and protect the frontiers of the settlements and man our forts upon our ocean-front? The latter service is more nominal than real and requires but few men. It is now too long since the close of the war that there is any need of soldiers in any of the States. Civil government can be best maintained by civil law. Our fathers thought that to civil government alone should be intrusted the preservation of peace, the protection of life and property, and the equal and just administration of the laws. The sheriff with the posse comitatus is entirely competent to maintain the supremacy of civil government, preserve the peace, and protect the rights of all in every State of the Union. Withdraw the Army and devolve that duty upon the civil authorities and the citizens of the States, and their self-respect and a decent regard for the opinions of mankind outside of a natural love of order and justice, and the spirit of self-preservation would strengthen the arm of the regularly constituted civil authority with the willing support of every patriot and well-wisher of good government in the land, if necessary. An army larger, then, than just sufficient to defend and protect our frontiers from the depredations of savage Indians in the main is useless.

No large force would seem to be required for even that purpose, except in the event of occasional wars. The border settlers are naturally a martial people, and need but little military training to become expert in the art of war. The youth are bred to the use of arms and to the manly and heroic sports of the chase and field. One of the chief characteristics of the western citizen is self-reliance and promptness and courage in self-defense. His main reliance is in his own manhood and in his own right arm.

A force of 22,000 men, with its trained officers, constitutes a sufficient nucleus upon which to enlarge should our country be threatened with foreign war. In such a case all history has proven how efficient and successful American armies have proven, composed in great part of citizen soldiery.

We need no large standing army as long as the people live under and up to a written constitution, and hold all political power ultimately in their own hands, as they have a right to do. They themselves constitute their best standing army. They are their own bulwark, their own surest defense. While our people shall love their country and maintain their liberties as citizens, they will be ever competent to its protection and defense whenever the emergency shall arise, no matter how sudden or what may be the odds.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make a speech upon this bill. Most of its provisions, in fact all the new legislation contained in the bill, has been considered in the Military Committee. The bills reported by that committee and passed by this House, and now waiting the action of the Senate, contain all of the economies proposed in this bill but one.

The bill reported from the Military Committee and passed, re-organizing the Army, as originally introduced, fixed the numerical strength of the Army at 22,000 men, the same as this bill. The Military Committee struck out that section of the bill, leaving the number of enlisted men in the Army at 25,000, as now provided by law. Although I have always been opposed to a large army, I came to the conclusion, as did the committee, after a careful study of the situation and the demand for troops for the protection of our railroads in and through the Indian country, the suppression of Indian hostilities, and the protection of the Texas frontier against Mexican raiders, that the fighting strength or enlisted men of the Army should not be reduced at this time. I gave my reasons for this opinion in the discussion of the Army bill, and the House approved that opinion by passing the bill reported.

I will not detain the House by repeating the reasons for that conclusion, for more reasons than one, chief among which is the fact that the legislation proposed by the Appropriation Committee in the bill now before the House is so near that of the Military Committee already passed by this House that a refusal to support it on my part would be unreasonable.

The proposition contained in this bill to reduce the Army to 22,000 is so guarded that under no circumstances can it result in any injury either to the service or the country.

The bill provides that "after the 1st of July there shall not be any new enlistments in the Army until the number of enlisted men shall have been reduced to 22,000." This is the exact provision of the original Army bill as referred to the Military Committee.

Now, if this provision is unwise or the reduction too great, before any mischief or injury can result from it, Congress will be in session again in December, and the clause can be repealed.

This, in connection with the fact that our Appropriation Committee, whose ability we all acknowledge, and whose well-considered economies are receiving the approval of the country, recommend it, prompt me to make no opposition to this feature of the bill.

Nearly all the other provisions of the bill are in the direction of economy and reform, and will, as I have argued before and repeat now, make our Army organization far more efficient and useful.

One word as to the economies of the bill. The re-organization of the Army and the reduction of Army officers' pay has not only been severely criticised, but sneered at by gentlemen upon this floor, and even characterized "as legislation to punish the Army." The House, however, passed the pay bill and the re-organization bill, and the Appropriation Committee in the bill now before us adopt the reductions recommended.

Under this bill the Army officers will be paid as follows:

The General, $12,000 a year.
The Lieutenant-General, $9,000 a year.
A major-general, $7,000 a year.
A brigadier general, $5,500 a year.
A colonel, $3,500 a year.
A lieutenant-colonel, $3,000 a year.
A major, $2,500 a year.
A captain, (mounted,) $2,000 a year.
A captain, (not mounted,) $1,800 a year.
An adjutant, $1,800 a year.
A regimental quartermaster, $1,800 a year.
A first lieutenant, (mounted,) $1,600 a year.
A first lieutenant, (not mounted,) $1,500 a year.
A second lieutenant, (mounted,) $1,500 a year.
A second lieutenant, (not mounted,) $1,400 a year: Provided, That for the first four years' service second lieutenants (mounted) shall receive $1,300 a year, and second lieutenants (not mounted) shall receive $1,200.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, these salaries are ample and sufficient, quite as much as our heavily-taxed constituents are able to pay, as much as Army officers earn. These salaries are 25 per cent. more than the annual receipts of the civilian who, when he is old, retires, not as the Army officers retire, upon 75 per cent. of a good salary, but—as is estimated—one in fifty upon an ample fortune, ten upon a competency, ten upon a bare living, one to the poor-house, while the balance are supported upon family charities, which consist of old clothes and cold victuals.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, these salaries are sufficient, and not only sufficient but satisfactory to the Army officers themselves, who recognize the necessity of a reduction of expenditures and expect to bear their proper proportion.

Mr. Chairman, to say that our Army management and Army legislation have been extravagant, wasteful, and hurtful to Army discipline has been too fully shown by developments made since this Congress commenced and too often proven upon this floor for me now to detain the House with their rehearsal.

In this connection I wish to call the attention of the House to a comparison between the estimates for our War Department, with our Army of 25,000 men, and the expense of the English army of 125,000 men; also that of France of 441,000 men.

This comparison has been made by a writer who says Secretary Belknap's War Department estimates call for the prodigious sum of $57,430,499.17 for the ensuing fiscal year. Now, whether we compare this with the cost of the American Army in previous years or whether we contrast it with the expense of the military force in Great Britain or France, the disproportion is still most enormous. The military service of the United States before the war never cost over $25,000,000 in any one year, with the single exception of 1847, the most active year of the Mexican war. Even since the war closed, and during the era of an inflated currency and high prices, the military service has cost far less than is now demanded in the midst of the universal depression under which the country is laboring. Let the reader compare the following figures:

Total cost of the military service for the fiscal year—

1870–'71	$35,799,901 82
1871–'72	35,372,157 20
1872–'73	46,323,138 31
1873–'74	42,343,927 22
1874–'75	38,710,645 00
Amount appropriated for 1875–'76	40,630,657 29
Amount asked in the estimates for 1876–'77	57,430,499 17

Here, it will be observed, is the Secretary of War asking for twenty millions more than has been expended by that branch of the public service in the average during the past six years, and more than double what was ever expended prior to 1860 for the Army service. Is there any good reason in the world why Congress should consent to making our Army, in a time of profound peace, cost the people twenty millions more money than it has been doing for these many years?

The expenses of our Army are not only great as compared with our own past, but they are largely disproportionate to the present cost of the much more numerous and efficient armies of any first-class power. The total cost of the British army averages only £15,000,000 a year, or about $75,000,000. There, for less than twenty millions more in dollars than is asked for by Secretary Belknap, Great Britain supports a standing army mustering a total of 125,000 men of all arms, while our little Army musters only 25,000 men. In other words, Great Britain gets five soldiers for what it costs the United States to secure the services of one and a quarter. If our Military Department were managed as economically as that of Great Britain, we ought to get an army of 100,000 soldiers for our expenditures of $57,000,000, instead of getting only one-fourth as many.

The army of France costs about $88,000,000 per annum; and for this sum that republic secures an effective army, mustering in time of peace no less than 441,000 men. Here we see for an expense but little more than half as much again as is asked for by the Secretary of War, an army of more than seventeen times the size of our own is maintained.

Sir, to consider further the increased and increasing expenses of our own organization. In 1872, with an Army of 30,000 men, the disbursements by the Pay Department alone amounted to $10,683,181.60. The Forty-third Congress reduced the Army to 25,000 men. The disbursements to the Army by the Pay Department for 1873 were $11,797,810.78; for 1874, $11,797,810.78; for 1875, $12,171,130.92. This has been our Army management—a reduction of the fighting strength of the Army of 5,000 men, and an annual increase in pay of one-half million of dollars, or an increase in three years in the pay of a reduced Army $1,487,949.32.

An examination into this matter will show that the reduction of 5,000 men by the Forty-third Congress was not followed by a corresponding reduction of officers. A further examination will show that after deducting the large amount of money paid our 2,168 commissioned officers for quarters, forage, and fuel, we have been paying them more money than we pay the entire army of 25,000 non-commissioned officers and privates.

This Congress was asked to appropriate by Secretary of War Belknap for the support of the military establishment $33,697,178.50. To this should be added $500,000 for a deficiency due the Army for a half month's pay for the last fiscal year, making the amount demanded of this Congress for the support of the Army $34,997,178.50 for next fiscal year, and last year's deficiencies being $5,866,108.50 more than the total amount appropriated for this fiscal year.

Hon. Alphonso Taft, Secretary of War, to whom this House referred these estimates for revision, reduced the amount $5,604,000. Thus establishing, not to say more, a reckless, extravagant, shameful demand of money by the War Department to defray the expenses of the military establishment.

Adopting many of the reforms and reductions provided for in the bills reported by the Military Committee which have passed this House, the Appropriations Committee present the bill under consideration. This bill appropriates $23,155,077.12 for the support of the military establishment for the next fiscal year, being $10,193,631.38 less than the amount asked for in the estimates of Secretary of War Belknap.

Mr. Chairman, this reduction is commendable for more reasons than one. First, because our financial condition demands of this House the exercise of every reasonable and proper economy; second, because the reforms and new legislation upon which these reductions are based will add to the efficiency and usefulness of the Army, as is fully shown in the testimony of Army officers before the Military Committee.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] says he will have to hold the Military Committee responsible for the reduction made in the bill of the amount allowed officers for commutation of quarters.

All officers serving without troops at posts where there are no public quarters received before the war and during the war the following amounts for commutation of quarters. I read from paragraph 1081 of the Army Regulations of 1863, page 161:

The following rates of monthly commutation for quarters, when officers are serving without troops and at posts where there are no public quarters which they can occupy, have been established:

First. At Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington City, Charleston, Key West, Mobile, and New Orleans, and at all posts and stations in Texas, and in the Territories of New Mexico, Oregon, and Washington, $9 per room.

Second. At Detroit, Chicago, and Saint Louis, and at all places east of the Rocky Mountains not heretofore enumerated, $8 per room.

Third. At San Francisco, $20 per room; at all other places in California, $12 per room.

At the time this was the rule the pay of officers was less than it now is, the currency of the country much less valuable, and the expense of living much greater.

Of late this amount has been increased to $18 per room per month throughout the country; so that now a colonel when on detail will receive $90 a month or $1,080 a year as commutation for quarters, while the colonel upon the frontier, who lives in a tent and daily risks his life in Indian warfare, gets no commutation of quarters.

A lieutenant-colonel, or a major, having a good time on duty at the Centennial, draws $70 a month as commutation of quarters, while the lieutenant-colonel or the major on duty in the field draws no commutation of quarters.

The captain on detail draws $54 a month as commutation for quarters, and the lieutenant $36.

The bill gives these officers on detail as commutation for quarters the following amounts: A colonel, $12 per room per month, $60 a month, or $720 a year; a lieutenant-colonel, or major, $48 per month, or $576 a year; a captain, $36, or $432 a year; and a lieutenant, $24 a month, or $288 a year.

In the opinion of the Military Committee, this was a fair and just reduction to make. The House, in passing the pay bill, approved this reduction. This makes a saving of $107,839.30 a year.

I ask to have read the following extract from the letter of a distinguished officer of our service on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

The old allowance when I entered the Army for officers was $9 per room. It is now $18. Cut it down to $12, in other words, cut down the estimate for appropriation for renting officers' quarters 33⅓ per cent. This will hire them better quarters than they get in garrison. In fact, the pay of officers being fixed by law, but the allowances being largely fixed by officers at Washington, the allowances are largely in excess of the pay, and have continually grown that way.

The pay of captain is now $150 per month, as against $125, or thereabouts, in 1861. The allowance for quarters is just double, or 100 per cent. increase, as against 20 per cent. of pay.

In the English army officers in their colonies receive double pay; in India quadruple. In ours the officer finds his compensation decrease as his service and risks grow greater. For instance, a captain taking the field has no quarters or fuel for his family; has to board them somewhere out of his $150 a month. In garrison he has modest quarters assigned him and fuel brought him. He has a cook-stove, some pine-tables, and five chairs, and his $150 a month besides. Let him get a detail in a city and he finds himself allowed $54 a month for quarters and an average of $40 for fuel, or an addition of two-thirds to his pay.

This is either too large for allowances or too small for pay.

Again, by taking the reduction out of the allowances, the condition of the officer on duty with his men is more nearly like that of those who are more favored. Reducing the allowances will do something toward preventing such a pressure of officers to get on all sorts of boards which take them to cities; boards to buy horses, boards to examine fire-arms, centennial boards, &c., and the morale of the Army would be thus far improved.

Believing that the question of where to pare would come up and that some paring is inevitable, I would respectfully invite your attention to the result of my fifteen years' experience as a captain in the line. I would not turn any laundress away, but would dispense with them as fast as they naturally pass out.

For a last item, quit building forty-thousand-dollar houses for second lieutenants of ordnance to live in, and quit building one-hundred-and-fifty-thousand-dollar houses for commanders of ordnance depots to live in, even if it does employ men in somebody's congressional district. For further information on this head, look at ordnance buildings at Rock Island.

Mr. HURLBUT. Who is the writer of that letter?

Mr. FORT. Give his name.

Mr. BANNING. The letter was written to a gentleman on the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TERRY.] The writer is an officer on duty on the frontier. I do not choose to give his name in order to submit him to persecution.

Mr. FORT. We do not want any anonymous letters here.

Mr. BANNING. The letter is not anonymous, but the letter of a gallant and able officer.

I trust this bill will receive the cordial support of the House and be passed without unnecessary delay. I am glad, sir, that the provisions of the pay bill of the Military Committee are embodied in this bill for another reason than those I have mentioned. When the pay bill passed this House many gentlemen who generally vote right, who did not have an opportunity to examine that bill, followed blind leaders and voted against an economy which is not only fair and just, but which is generally approved by the men whose salaries are reduced.

The CHAIRMAN. By the order of the House general debate upon this bill is now closed, and it will be read by paragraphs for amendments under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the gentleman who has this bill in charge why it is that in reporting all the appropriation bills to this House the Committee on Appropriations have cut down the pay of all the officers and employés of the Government except in the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I believe that the naval appropriation bill is not now under consideration. I can answer any question that pertains to this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the officers of the Army shall be entitled to the pay herein stated after their respective designations:

The General, $12,000 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the clause relating to the pay of the General of the Army by striking out $12,000 and inserting $13,500. And I propose to make a like motion in relation to the next clause applying to the pay of Lieutenant-General of the Army. The amount named in my amendment is the amount now paid the General of the Army. The compensation of the General and Lieutenant-General of the Army was fixed, not because the Congress of the United States or the people of the United States thought that the offices required that amount of pay, but because a grateful people desired to give to the officers holding those positions a competency for distinguished services. For that reason, and that reason alone, was the salary of the General of the Army fixed at $13,500 a year.

It should be remembered also that these offices expire with the lives of the generals now occupying them. I appeal to the gentlemen on the other side of the House, especially to those who fought on the opposite side during the late war, to stand by this proposition of reward to these distinguished generals, and let them continue to receive what a grateful people in the hour of their triumph thought they ought to receive.

Mr. MILLS. Why not make the salary of the General of the Army the same as that proposed for the Admiral of the Navy, $13,500 a year?

Mr. FOSTER. We are not dealing with the Admiral of the Navy now.

Mr. BANNING. In reply to my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] I have but this to say: the General of the Army is now receiving $18,081.91 a year. The pay for the General of the Army was first fixed when General Grant was appointed to the position, and during his time it was reduced a small sum.

The Committee on Military Affairs took this matter fully into consideration and reported to the House in favor of reducing the pay of the General of the Army to $10,000 a year, believing that that was sufficient pay for that officer at that time. He was then living at Saint Louis. Since then orders have been issued transferring the headquarters of the Army to Washington, and the Committee on Appropriations have reported in favor of giving the General of the Army $2,000 more; that is, $1,000 a month.

I think that is good pay in this country at this time. It is large pay for him.

The gentleman says this was given to him because he was a distinguished soldier in the Army. I grant it; but how many distinguished soldiers of the Army who were major-generals, regular-Army officers—such as Stanley, who saved the battle of Franklin—are to-day not only not receiving the pay they then received, but reduced from the pay of major-general and simply receiving the pay of a colonel in the Army? Not only Stanley, but hundreds of others have been thus reduced.

This Government cannot pay these men with money. Money will not reward them. They did not risk their lives or give their blood for the money to be paid, but for their country.

But, sir, to-day, when the Government pays the General of the Army $12,000 a year, is it not paying him well? It pays him more than any officer of the Government except the President of the United States. I would gladly give this to the distinguished General of our Army, but it is not mine to give. Nations must be just before they are generous with the people's money. Nay, I do not believe it is the right of a legislator under any circumstances to be generous in giving more of the people's money than necessity requires. Let us in place of increasing these salaries decrease them, and thus reduce the burden of taxation imposed upon the people. Let us not give it all to the General of the Army, but let us also be just to others. Let us reduce as far as may be right the burden of taxation, which to-day is piled upon a million and a half of the very men who fought in our Army to save the Government and who are now getting nothing.

This is a fair reduction. The House has agreed to it once. I trust it will stand by it now. I believe this is enough. It is as much as the country will justify us in giving. It is as much as we ought to give. The Military Committee agreed to it. The House agreed to it when it was less. We ought to stand by it now, because I think it is enough.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to strike out the last word.

I do not intend to antagonize the clear right of the majority of this House, which I have always believed in, to shape legislation; nor do I intend to throw any obstacle in the way of the rapid progress of business. Especially it was not my intention to attack the reduction made by this bill as it had been passed upon by the House already in the military bill. But as the question has come up here now, I desire to submit to the House there is a great deal of force in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas. This House has no right to place the Admiral of the Navy, whose assimilated rank is precisely the same as that of the General of the Army, upon a different and better footing. And as the naval appropriation bill continues this pay of $13,500 to the Admiral of the Navy, it is simple justice to the General of the Army he should stand upon the same basis, given by the nation long ago. The two ranks are precisely alike. Therefore, sir, I hope we may have a fair and distinct vote on that question and upon the one which is to follow in regard to the rank and pay of the Lieutenant-General of the Army.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that in the Navy the officers partook of prize-money, from which officers of the Army were debarred. Naval officers not only had that opportunity and realized enormous benefits, but the same advantage is open to them in the future.

Mr. HURLBUT. And is that the reason therefore you should keep their pay high?

Mr. RANDALL. No, I wish it to be equal. The pay of the Admiral should be $12,000.

Mr. HURLBUT. But has it not been passed?

Mr. RANDALL. It has not been considered, so far as I know. We have raised this pay from what the House and what the Military Committee recommended.

Mr. MILLS. It is being considered as an amendment to the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HURLBUT. The pay of the Admiral so far as the action of the House is concerned has been placed at $13,500.

Mr. BANNING. His pay should be $12,000.

Mr. HURLBUT. Why not make it so?

Mr. BANNING. That was not my business.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope we will have a division on this amendment. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. The House will observe that the present bill fixes the pay of the General at $12,000; whereas the bill (H. R. No. 2817) which was reported from the Military Committee and passed the House fixes his salary at $10,000. The Committee on Appropriations felt that $12,000 was enough, and that the pay of the General should be fixed at that rate.

The question being taken on Mr. FOSTER's amendment, there were—ayes 19, noes 61.

So (further count not being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

The Lieutenant-General, $9,000 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by striking out "$9,000" and inserting "$11,000."

I move the sum asked in this case as in that of the General himself. It is no answer to say that we may economize on these two officers. I repeat that these salaries were fixed for distinguished services, and I am sure that my colleague is mistaken when he says that the country demands that the salaries of these distinguished generals, which were fixed because of their distinguished services to the country, should be reduced by the amount here proposed.

Probably of all the reductions that have been made here in this House where they ought not to be made—I will not characterize them—this is the smallest and the least. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the people of this country do not ask that these distinguished generals shall have their salaries reduced. If you are going to put it upon a mere question of what is a proper compensation, you may reduce it to what you think officers of that rank ought to have. But do not in this centennial year, if you please, reduce the salaries of generals who have rendered such distinguished services. The responsibility is with you, gentlemen on the other side, and if you attempt to do this thing I tell you the country will not stand by you.

Mr. RANDALL. The Military Committee recommended and the House passed a bill fixing the pay of a lieutenant-general at $8,000. The Committee on Appropriations, so as to indicate to the country that there was no possible hostility in any way whatever toward these officers, has raised the salary to $9,000. And I might as well make the general remark here as anywhere else that, so far as this side of the House is concerned and that part of it to which the gentleman rather by inference than in any other way alluded—is concerned, great kindness and consideration have been shown to the Army, and a great sensitiveness has been exhibited lest we should in any degree do any act that should imply a reflection upon the Army of the United States. I have admired very much in those gentlemen that spirit of magnanimity which they have exhibited in this particular. Their magnanimity sometimes in this respect has led, as I have thought, into extravagance; but I have always attributed this to the fact that they were prompted, perhaps, by their hearts rather than their heads.

This House therefore is not chargeable, nor this side of it, nor any portion of it, and least of all that portion, with anything which looked like an effort to make a reduction of the expenditures of the Army which would produce inefficiency or cause any hardship to any officer or private in the Army. It is due to those gentlemen to say that; and that any cutting that has been done as against the Army has rather been done by those who stood by the Union in every respect during the conflict.

I do not think that this bill in any degree impairs either the efficiency of the Army or the esprit de corps at all. No such purpose is intended.

Of all the appropriation bills that have been submitted to the House there has been none, so far as I have been able to see and know, that has received more generally the approval of the Department with the discharge of whose duties it is connected than has this bill. There is really no complaint, so far as I know on the part of the Department as to the changes proposed, although there may be a difference of opinion as to some minor points. There is really no objection to the bill on the part of the War Department.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not propose to make any factious opposition to this bill. Perhaps I will not occupy the floor again. I rose simply to say that the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations have stated to the House that this bill is in accord with the views of the Army officers and of the War Department. They have failed to produce a single line from any single officer to that effect, and I wish to say that so far as my interviews with those gentlemen are concerned, I should be disposed to take exactly the contrary view on this question.

Mr. RANDALL. I spoke of the main, of the large reductions; I did not speak of the reduction of these salaries. Of course they have human nature as well as the rest of us.

Mr. FOSTER. This bill, for the number of officers and the size of the Army proposed, so far as I can judge, is a fair one. I believe a proper amount is appropriated for the number of men; for the size of the Army. And I do not propose to make any factious opposition to it. There is no quorum here and I want gentlemen to get along with their bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not suppose that the amendments were offered in any factious spirit.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has spoken the truth in saying that in dealing with this subject there has been great consideration for the distinguished gentlemen who hold the higher official positions in connection with our Army. Not only that, but there has been a very great anxiety to avoid any seeming reduction of the military force of the Government, or the appropriation for it that might by any human possibility impair the efficiency of this branch of the public service, or diminish its importance in the estimation of the country.

But, taking the item which is now under consideration, the appropriation of $9,000 for the coming fiscal year for the office of Lieutenant-General, I think the gentleman from Ohio, whose drift of opinion is generally admirable and patriotic, misapprehends the sense in which he makes use of the term "the centennial year." He says that in this centennial year there should not be a discrimination in your legislation against the distinguished gentleman who holds the high office at the head of our military establishment.

Now, sir, this salary of $9,000 a year is certainly a very ample salary. It is the third highest salary, except I believe the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under this Government. The salary paid to the General of the Army is the second highest salary paid by the Government. Nine thousand dollars a year is $750 a month, and the high services which the distinguished gentleman who holds the position rendered in the cause of the nation would perhaps alone justify such a salary. He is in some sense a representative of that great army which but a short time since was shaking the very earth in the struggle for the Union.

But my friend forgets that this is the centennial year, although he used the term. He forgets the spirit of the period which the present year typifies and of which it is the symbol, the Government of the people, by the people, and for the people; a Government under which every citizen who well and truly fulfills his duties of citizenship is to receive proper recognition at the hands of the Republic.

Now, my friend does not seek to bring forward the bill to equalize the bounties of soldiers——

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman has no right to put me in that position.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me finish my sentence. We paid these men in the ranks, who bore the heat and burden of the day in that fearful contest, a vast number of whom fell upon the field, the little pittance of $16 a month. We paid some of them no bounties at all, and we paid some of them only $100; some more and some less. We delayed last Congress and we have delayed up to the present hour in this Congress to do them justice because it is objected to by some gentlemen that the Treasury cannot bear such a drain on it at this time. That was the argument in the last Congress and it is the argument of this Congress.

You pay the widow of the soldier who sacrificed not only health but life itself in defense of the Republic $8 a month or $96 a year to support herself and her little children, the orphans of the dead soldier. You pay only $96 a year to the widow of the man who sacrificed his life for this Republic, and yet the gentleman in this centennial year stands up and speaks about the discrimination against the officers of the Army because we do not fix the compensation of the Lieutenant-General at a rate exceeding $9,000 per annum.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSTER. If I understood the gentleman from Indiana he charged me with opposing the bringing forward of the soldiers' bounty bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no, I did not use the word "opposing;" I said the gentleman had not been pressing.

Mr. BANNING. I merely desire to say one word in reply to my colleague, which is this: The Lieutenant-General of the Army now receives $13,593.86 a year. The Military Committee reduced his salary to $8,000 a year. The Committee on Appropriations have put it up $1,000. Now my colleague tells me that this is a reduction which ought not to be made. He says that he knows no officer in the Army who approves this bill, and that he knows of no such evidence. That is only because my colleague has been working so hard on the Committee on Appropriations to perform his duties to the country and to his constituents that he has not had time to look into other matters, or he would know that the distinguished General of the Army whose pay we have just reduced says that if you cut off, cut off at the head, and not at the foot.

Mr. HURLBUT. But you cut off at both ends.

Mr. FOSTER. He says "if."

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman says "if." Is it possible that any gentleman in this House thinks that there is an "if" in the way of the necessity of reducing the expenditures of the Government?

The gentleman says that our constituents will not stand this. I ask him if he is going back to his constituents and tell them that he did not reduce those salaries because the taxation upon them now is not too heavy? There is no "if" in the matter. The necessity is upon us now; the demand is now at our door. It is doubtful if we will have enough to pay the expenses of this Government during the next fiscal year with the present rate of taxation. Where will you get the money; where will you find it?

We have reduced the salaries of all the clerks, those officials that now receive a compensation barely sufficient to support them; we have reduced the salaries of all officers now receiving small pay. Is it not right that these generals of the Army now receiving kingly salaries of $18,000 and $13,000 a year should have their compensation reduced? With any just man the answer will certainly be, yes.

General Sherman said: "If you must reduce, cut down my pay and Sheridan's pay and the pay of the officers who are receiving their thousands, those receiving $18,000, $13,000, and $10,000 a year; cut down our pay, and not the salaries of the clerks who receive so little." I believe this is a just and fair reduction. It will leave General Sheridan $9,000 a year, which certainly is enough for him. Why should he have his pay fixed at $13,000 a year, when other officers equally distinguished with himself, equally useful to the country, officers who led their commands into the thick of the fight, who have suffered all the hardships of war, have their compensation reduced?

That is not in keeping with the spirit of our Government; it is not in keeping with the spirit of our free institutions. It might be well enough abroad in other countries, where the rule seems to be to pay everything to the kings, the emperors, the generals of the army, and nothing to the subject and the private soldier. But in this land of equality that rule will not do. It will not do for my friend and colleague, [Mr. FOSTER,] who tells me that my constituents do not demand this at my hands—it will not do for him to stand upon that sandy foundation, for strong as he is with his constituents, and worthily so, he will go down upon that sand-bar sooner, I believe, than I will upon the proposition to reduce the salaries of men who are overpaid, and not to reduce too much the salaries of men who are not now too well paid.

The question was then taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. FOSTER, to make the salary of the Lieutenant-General $11,000 a year; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

A second lieutenant, (not mounted,) $1,400 a year: Provided, That for the first four years' service second lieutenants (mounted) shall receive $1,300 a year and second lieutenants (not mounted) shall receive $1,200 a year.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to strike out the proviso of the paragraph just read. I make that motion in order that I may have the opportunity to state to the House, from some knowledge of this matter, that the first four years of service of an officer who comes from West Point are among the most expensive years of his life. During that time he is compelled to provide himself with his outfit and all the necessary equipage of his position. I do not believe in the justice of making the distinction proposed by the Committee on Appropriations in this proviso: that for the first four years' service the pay of second lieutenants shall be cut down $200 a year.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is not that outfit procured from the pay of the lieutenant while at the Military Academy?

Mr. HURLBUT. No; he never has enough of that pay left over for the purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood from the course of the debate on the Military Academy bill that the outfit of the lieutenant when he left the Academy was provided from the surplus of his pay as a cadet.

Mr. HURLBUT. That is not so. There never is a sufficient surplus for the purpose.

Mr. BANNING. I would say to the House that this proviso was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and we came to the conclusion that it was proper and necessary, after consulting many officers of the Army, whose testimony is now before the House. Many of the leading officers of the Army say that young officers for the first four years of their service should receive a compensation barely sufficient for them to live upon; that any extra money they might have would be spent in dissipation, and if they have any surplus over the amount required for their support it will be hurtful and injurious rather than beneficial. General Vincent, our present adjutant-general, served in Florida on a great deal less pay than this. The testimony of several of the ablest and most competent officers of the Army is to the effect I have stated.

The Committee on Military Affairs believed that this reduction was not only in the interest of economy to the country, but also in the interest of the young officers, who will be better off, as the old officers say, if they are taught economy when they first enter the service. That is the reason why the Committee on Military Affairs finally agreed to report this proposition.

The amendment of Mr. HURLBUT was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That now or hereafter no officer selected, detailed, or assigned to duty upon the staff of, or as aid to, any general officer, or upon any other duty whatsoever, shall be entitled to or receive any additional rank, pay, or allowance by reason of such selection, detail, or assignment; and all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this section are hereby repealed.

Mr. HURLBUT. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what is meant by the language—

That now or hereafter no officer selected, detailed, or assigned to duty upon the staff of, or as aid to, any general officer, or upon any other duty whatsoever, shall be entitled to or receive any additional rank, pay, or allowance by reason of such selection, detail, or assignment.

Does he mean that a captain detailed on the staff of the general commanding the Army shall not have staff rank? Is it proposed to keep him at his lineal rank in the Army?

Mr. BANNING. I think that word "rank" should be stricken out, and it should be "pay and allowance."

Mr. HURLBUT. Then I move to strike out the word "rank."

Mr. HOLMAN. The pay is the substance of the matter.

Mr. HURLBUT. I supposed you meant pay only, and therefore made the suggestion to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to the word "rank" being stricken out. It was intended merely that there should be no increase of pay, and in that regard the section is perfectly proper.

Mr. HURLBUT. Then I move to strike out the word "rank."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to offer a substitute for the whole of section 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any officer selected, detailed, or assigned to duty upon the staff of, or as aid to, any general officer shall be entitled to receive the pay and allowances of the grade in the Army next above his actual rank in the Army.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope that substitute will not be adopted.

Mr. HURLBUT. The Military Committee, when they had the military bill under consideration, as I remember, for I have not the bill before me now, agreed substantially to that proposition; and I wish to state to the House the effect of and the reason for the substitute. We will take for example a captain of the line who is assigned to staff duty with a major-general of the Army. He is generally removed from his quarters. The quarters of the major-general are established in a city where the cost of living is much higher, and it is only just and right, in my opinion, that he should be entitled to the pay of the rank next above his lineal rank in the Army to make good the additional expense which he is subjected to. Otherwise you make the position instead of an honor a burden on the officer. You compel him by assigning him to this honorable position of staff officer to incur a larger expense than he would if he were in garrison or in the field. I think it is just and right, and I hope the substitute will be adopted instead of the section as it now stands in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail. The third section gives no additional pay to an officer because of his assignment to staff duty, and in my judgment there should be none, for the officer who is assigned, taking in his period of service, takes his chance as to that assignment. Indeed there has been no little criticism in reference to these assignments of officers to staff duty.

Mr. HURLBUT. And very properly so.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been much criticism which I do not propose to discuss, as it would be entering upon personal matters, in reference to which at this time I do not wish to allude. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, these staff assignments are very desirable and much sought after. There are no officers hardly in the Army anywhere who do not desire them. They are generally very pleasant positions. The consequent increased pay has been the occasion, as we learn, of a good deal of feeling and heart-burning in the service. We therefore have deemed it best to do away entirely with this discrimination as to pay in favor of staff officers.

Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that this was done after a good deal of reflection and consultation.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let me state to the gentleman, in order that the House may understand this matter intelligently, that the law and regulations as they stand provide that if you take a captain from the line and make him an aid to the General of the Army, he shall have the rank and pay and emoluments of a colonel, which is entirely too much, I admit; and that if you detail the same officer and make him aid to the Lieutenant-General, he shall take the rank and pay and emoluments of a lieutenant-colonel, and that is too large a premium. But, sir, I believe the amendment I have suggested will relieve all this heart-burning. I do not make so broad a distinction between such service and the line service. Yet the amendment provides that the officers assigned to staff duty shall have a sufficient increase of pay to meet the necessary and inevitable expense under the circumstances.

Mr. RANDALL. The impression made upon my mind and the conclusion which I have reached satisfy me that any difference in reference to pay given to the officer by reason of favoritism because of his assignments we may as well understand are a species of favoritism, officers having been known to assign their own sons upon their staff; that any difference in reference to pay will continue the heart-burning of which I have already spoken. The House can readily see that when increased pay is given to these special assignments to the staff how that will bring about heart-burning. To remedy all such heart-burning in reference to these assignments the best way, in my judgment, is to provide there shall be no discrimination at all as to pay, and that is what this bill proposes to do.

Mr. KELLEY. If my colleague will permit me, I would like to suggest to him that the modification proposed by the gentleman from Illinois seems to me to be an equitable one.

Mr. RANDALL. It is in the right direction.

Mr. KELLEY. It is a long step in the right direction. And I do not think that the difference between the office filled by the officer assigned and the grade above him, as between a captain and a major, or between a major and a lieutenant-colonel, or between a lieutenant-colonel and a colonel, would lead to heart-burning, or would be so material as to induce gentlemen to seek assignments. Nor do I believe that in perhaps a majority of cases in time of peace would this pay the additional expenses entailed by the assignment. I think that this might be done by general consent. It would be a long step in the right direction.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not far enough. That is the only trouble. It still leaves the occasional heart-burnings that would arise from such discriminations. I admit that this is a proposition in the right direction, but it does not go far enough.

Mr. KELLEY. I think that it will be found in practice that it does go far enough; that is, that it provides sufficient compensation for extra expenses incurred.

Mr. HOLMAN. The pay is ample.

Mr. KELLEY. Of course by these assignments you involve these officers in increased expenses.

The question being taken on Mr. HURLBUT's substitute, there were—ayes 33, noes 53.

So (further count not being demanded) the substitute was not agreed to.

Mr. BANNING. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section:

No officer shall fill any staff appointment or other situation the duties of which will detach him from his company, regiment, or corps until he has served three years with his regiment or corps; nor shall any officer (aids-de-camp excepted) so remain detached longer than four years.

Mr. HURLBUT. That is the law now.

Mr. BANNING. I grant the gentleman there is a possibility that it is the law. But if it is the law, it is constantly violated.

Mr. ATKINS. If no point of order is made on the amendment I do not object to it.

Mr. HURLBUT. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following section:

SEC. 5. That all chaplains hereafter appointed shall be appointed for a term of four years only, subject to re-appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to strike out the section just read.

I am unable to see any good result from a change in the existing law in relation to the appointment of chaplains. At present the chaplains are appointed for life; but by this section they are hereafter to be appointed for the period of four years only.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the only effect of this can be to make the chaplains practically office-seekers. You compel men who desire to serve in the regular Army as chaplains to come here and secure their appointments; and then at the end of four years they must come here again and seek a re-appointment. I believe it will result very much in degrading the character of the chaplains of the Army. It is certainly not in the interest of retrenchment, because it will cost the Government as much if they are thus appointed as they are now costing the Government. But to bring the chaplains down to the level of ordinary office-seekers is utterly to degrade the character of the office.

It will be very readily seen that it will be very much better for a chaplain who has had any experience in the service to be re-appointed or to continue in the service rather than that he should be turned out. A man who has been a chaplain in the Army for fifteen or twenty years is unfit to go back into the service from which he came. He is unfit for the office of a minister in any church. His life, for the period of fifteen years he has been in the service, has unfitted him for the kind of duty from which he was taken when he was made a chaplain. I am unable to conceive of any good reason why these men who are to serve in the Army as chaplains should be compelled every four years to seek re-appointment. I say it is simply degrading a high and sacred office.

Mr. ATKINS. I differ with the gentleman from Minnesota. I think, sir, as regards the chaplain who proves himself efficient and worthy there will be no difficulty in his being re-appointed to his position without any office-seeking on his part. If, on the contrary, he should not be an acceptable chaplain, it would be rather hard on the soldiers to have him fastened like a barnacle upon them all his life. I think that the change proposed is a good one. If he is an efficient man, there will be no difficulty about his being re-appointed. If he is inefficient, it would be rather hard upon the service to have him remain all his life, or as long as he chooses, in a position for which he is not fit.

Mr. BANNING. I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] that this was a suggestion that came from the Military Committee. It came originally from General MACDOUGALL, a member of that committee, and I wish to give the gentleman the reason for it. This change was recommended because it turned out on examination that the majority of the chaplains in the service are not very worthy men; that as a whole they are not very useful men. This amendment was introduced in order that the appointments might be made over again, and that the Army might get the advantage of having better chaplains.

On this subject we have much testimony; and I desire to have read the opinion which General Palmer has of the Army chaplains, and then I believe my friend from Minnesota will have no objection to the law being made as proposed in this bill. I hope every gentleman will listen to this passage, that he may see the reasons for the change.

The Clerk read as follows:

I cannot leave this subject, however, without bringing to your attention what almost every intelligent officer considers the greatest incubus in the Army—that is, the post chaplains. A more useless and worthless set of drones and idlers were never fastened upon any body of men. The men who have been appointed to these positions are generally characterless men, who are no example to either the officers or men, and they bring the Christian religion into contempt wherever they go. These are hard words to say, but when I say that the Army chaplain is a by-word and a reproach to the Army I merely state what nearly every intelligent officer knows to be a fact. There are a few honorable exceptions. But unless we can procure refined and cultivated gentlemen to administer to the religious wants of a man we had better have none at all.

Mr. BANNING. Now, Mr. Chairman, allow me one word. That is the opinion of General Palmer, and there are half a dozen other opinions of a similar character in this report showing that these men are generally men who are of no use in the Army, who are an incubus upon it, and the committee propose that they shall be re-appointed and reconfirmed every four years. If they are men of good character, there will be no difficulty in securing their re-appointment and re-confirmation by the Senate. I think the Army should be relieved of such men as are described in the letter of General Palmer, and that proper men should be appointed to administer to the spiritual wants of our soldiers.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not see how the change in the law which the gentleman proposes will get rid of the bad men now acting as chaplains. It proposes to let the existing chaplains remain; and this change of law applies only to those to be appointed hereafter. Now, I would like to have him tell me how that is going to help the matter. This change in the law does not propose to discharge the chaplains we now have; and the communication which has been read is not evidently in favor of chaplains at all; and I should say that the writer of that letter needs the prayers of a good chaplain. I am unable to see how we are to better that branch of the service if we are to keep in under this bill all the existing chaplains, simply providing that hereafter they shall be appointed once in four years.

The letter which has been read looks to doing away with chaplains altogether; but you do not propose that, but simply more frequent appointments. Now, sir, when there is a vacancy in the office of chaplain there will be a dozen men who want the place, and there will be a scramble for it, and, if it is to be but for four years, that scramble will be repeated every four years.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there is no retrenchment in this section, that my motion to strike it out will prevail. I do not know but that the section could be objected to on the point of order. It is new legislation and there is no retrenchment in it. I am not given to making points of order or perhaps I would have made one on this section. I repeat that it is new legislation and there is no retrenchment in it, and I hope the committee will strike out this obnoxious provision.

Mr. BANNING. If there is anything in the point of order it certainly comes too late; but the provision is certainly in the direction of reform: it turns off the bad chaplains and secures good ones. Now the gentleman says that this does not take us in the direction of getting better chaplains for the Army. I think he is mistaken. I have sufficient faith in the Senate to believe that, when a chaplain comes to be confirmed again and it is brought to their notice that that man is worthless, the Senate will not confirm him.

Mr. DUNNELL. But you do not propose to get rid of the men now holding these offices under this bill.

Mr. BANNING. They have to come back for re-appointment.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let me call attention to one thing. This section 5 only applies to chaplains hereafter appointed. That was not the proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Military Affairs want it to apply to those already in the service.

Mr. HURLBUT. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations hesitated to strike out these chaplains in the Army who had been appointed on the supposition and in fact under a law which made them permanently in the Army. The proposition of the Committee on Appropriations is that in all future appointments it shall be for four years only. There is a good deal of force in the argument as to the character of these chaplains who are willing to go into the Army. Sometimes we get chaplains in the Army who do not come up to the religious standard, and hereafter every four years we can adopt the old Methodist policy, of probation and if a chaplain does not come up to the requirements of the service we can get rid of him. As it is now, a bad chaplain is fastened upon the service for his life-time. There is a great deal of force in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs which applies to chaplains hereafter appointed, but the Committee on Appropriations hesitated to make war upon chaplains, even though sometimes chaplains that have received appointments do not have those evangelical qualities which ought to predominate in that class of human nature.

Mr. BANNING. I suggest to the gentleman that he make an amendment to strike out the words "hereafter appointed;" so that it will read:

That all chaplains shall be appointed for a term of four years only, subject to re-appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman can submit that motion to the committee and the committee can act upon it.

The question was taken on Mr. DUNNELL's motion to strike out the fifth section of the bill, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BANNING. I now move to strike out the words "hereafter appointed," so as to make the section apply to all chaplains, those now in the service as well as to those hereafter appointed; and I wish to say that the letter read here from General Palmer shows that it should apply to all chaplains.

The question was taken on Mr. BANNING's motion; and there were—ayes 35, noes 27; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNNELL's and Mr. BANNING were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 42, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the number of cavalry regiments is hereby reduced to eight, and the number of artillery and infantry regiments to twenty-three. And the Secretary of War, as soon as the requirements of the service will permit, holding in view the least expense on account of transportation, shall cause the reduction to be made by the merging of the enlisted men into other organizations, either of their own or other regiments, by the consolidation into troops, companies, or otherwise, and the assignment of the commissioned officers to duty with the consolidated troops or companies, or with other regiments of their respective arms: Provided, That the officers of the discontinued regiments may be assigned to other regiments of their respective arms, according to their dates of commission, as vacancies may occur, and any officer, on his own application, may be honorably discharged with one year's pay; and sections 1104 and 1108 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed, and hereafter there shall be no distinction in the service on account of color.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to amend that section in the third line by striking out the word "three" after the word "twenty," so as to reduce the number of regiments to twenty instead of twenty-three.

Mr. Chairman, at the commencement of the last session of Congress my recollection is that the whole military force of the United States amounted to 30,000 men. During the last Congress the military force was reduced 5,000, and now under this bill I see that the Committee on Appropriations propose to reduce it 2,000. I had supposed after making some very thorough investigation of this subject during the last Congress that the standing military force of the United States ought not to exceed 15,000 men. It is true that I am willing to submit in some degree to the estimates made in this regard by the Military Committee and by the Committee on Appropriations, but if I could have my own way I would not have one single man in the service exceeding 15,000 men. I am willing, however, to concede that the number stand at 20,000, and my amendment contemplates reducing the force to 20,000, and when we come to the second clause of this bill I shall offer an amendment, in case my amendment prevails, to make it conform to the first one.

Now, why do I make this statement? When I look to the vast Northwest, to the Middle and the Eastern States, I do not find any cause there for military force except upon the frontier; but as soon as I pass a certain line, dividing the North from the South, I find a company here and a company there in States where, in my humble judgment, there is no necessity for a standing Army. Let me illustrate. In my own congressional district ever since the cessation of hostilities there has been a company quartered at Lancaster, in the county of Garrard. I am sorry to say that they perform no services.

I may refer also to another company stationed at Lebanon, Marion County, in the district of my distinguished colleague, [Mr. KNOTT.] I never heard that they performed one iota of military service. Now why is that $10,000 appropriated for the maintenance of the one company, and $10,000 for the maintenance of the other? I ask what are their services? Why are our own militia called on whenever there is military action required of that sort? I see that during the last six weeks those two companies have been called away from their stations and located in the district represented by my colleague, [Mr. JONES,] at Newport. Why at Newport? What services are they to discharge there? Are they to guard Cincinnati or the Ohio River? Not at all. You had much better send them on to the Texas frontier, for I believe gentlemen are clamoring here, and no doubt justly, for protection against raiders and marauders who come into Texas from the Mexican territory. If I had my own way I would send all these troops out of the Southern States and send them to the frontier, for that is the only place where they are needed, and for the protection of the frontier in my judgment 20,000 men is sufficient.

Mr. ATKINS. This section only applies to the regiments; it does not apply to the mean force.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I offer the following amendment:

In section 6, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "is hereby reduced to eight" and insert "shall hereafter be twelve;" and in line 3, strike out the words "twenty-three" and insert "reduce to eighteen."

The effect of this amendment is to reduce the total number of regiments, but it increases the cavalry service. The service actually done upon the frontier is done by the cavalry. You need infantry only for garrison duty. I will read one sentence from General Ord's testimony before the Special Committee on the Texas Border Troubles:

Question. I suppose that only cavalry is available for active purposes?

Answer. The cavalry is much more rapidly concentrated at any point on the river than infantry would be. This sort of service requires cavalry, for these men are all mounted, and to send infantry after them would be like sending the tortoise to catch the deer.

He refers to the Mexican raider upon our border, and the raiders in these cases are all mounted.

The same is true of the Indians who commit depredations in Texas, and therefore infantry is only useful on the border for garrison duty.

This amendment is for the purpose of making the total number of regiments thirty-one. Now I propose to reduce the total to only thirty-one regiments, but have them distributed in a different manner, so that hereafter there will be twelve regiments of cavalry and only eighteen regiments of infantry, instead of twenty-three, as the bill here proposes, and you cannot reduce the cavalry without involving very great injury on the people of the frontier.

I therefore propose that this section shall be amended as I have indicated. The proposition of the Committee on Appropriations is that the present number of cavalry regiments, ten, shall be reduced to eight and that the present number of infantry regiments, twenty-five, shall be reduced to twenty-three, making a total of thirty-one regiments. I propose to reduce the total number of regiments to thirty, instead of thirty-one, but to have them proportioned in a different manner; that is, that there shall hereafter be twelve regiments of cavalry and only eighteen regiments of infantry.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] what will be the difference in cost between the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations and the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. SCHLEICHER?]

Mr. RANDALL. I think the expense of a cavalry regiment now is about $708,000 a year and of an infantry regiment about $330,000 a year. It must be remembered that there are more men in a cavalry regiment than in an infantry regiment.

Mr. HURLBUT. A regiment of cavalry costs more than twice as much as a regiment of infantry, partly because the cavalry regiment is larger.

Mr. ATKINS. In answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] I will say that the cost of a cavalry regiment is $708,216 a year, of an infantry regiment $331,985 a year. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] has said, a cavalry regiment costs more than twice as much as an infantry regiment.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Allow me one moment. I would call the attention of gentlemen who are familiar with the service to this fact, that if the number of men in a cavalry regiment is made as small as in an infantry regiment the service will be so heavy upon the troops that there must be very frequent remounts. With a small force all the regiments would be continually in the field, and the horses would have no opportunity for rest. If a cavalry regiment should be made as small as an infantry regiment the additional cost in the way of remounts would make the total expense as large as it is now.

Mr. RANDALL. There are twelve companies in a cavalry regiment and only ten companies in an infantry regiment.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I trust the amendment of my colleague [Mr. SCHLEICHER] will be adopted, for I think the reasons why it should be are very cogent. I will not speak of any other portion of the country than that with which I am personally acquainted. From the Canadian Fork, on the northern border of Texas, to the Rio Grande, is about seven hundred miles in a direct line, rather more following the line of frontier. From Brownsville to El Paso, on the Rio Grande, is some one thousand or twelve hundred miles more, making a total line of frontier of about sixteen hundred miles, which is exposed on the one hand to Indian depredations and on the other to Mexican raiders.

It is a fact, which must be known to every gentleman on this floor who is at all acquainted with the necessity of the kind of service required on our frontiers, that infantry is almost entirely useless. They would be of but little service, except it be at Fort Sill, where they might be of service in restraining the Indians about the agency. But for the pursuit of Indians and the protection of the exposed line of frontier, infantry are almost entirely worthless. That applies equally well to portions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and perhaps other portions of our territory.

In the active duty, the field duty required of the Army, with a comparatively few exceptions, cavalry troops would render ten times the service that infantry troops could do. I do not know what number of infantry is now engaged in that service, but the troops so engaged should be almost entirely cavalry. Although a cavalry regiment may cost more than an infantry regiment, still I believe that in the end it would be a great deal preferable in the way of economy to adopt the proposition of my colleague [Mr. SCHLEICHER] in lieu of the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM;] and I hope the proposition of my colleague will be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. A bill has already passed the House to reduce the number of cavalry regiments in the Army. The present number of cavalry regiments in the Army, if I am correctly informed, is only ten. The proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] is to increase the number of regiments of cavalry to twelve, or to make the number two more than we now have. I do not think that is desirable. There might be some propriety in continuing the number of cavalry regiments at what they now are, and make the reduction of the Army apply entirely to the infantry and artillery. If I am well advised, I think it is a practice in the Army to mount some of the infantry whenever a necessity requires it.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask if my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on the Texas Border Troubles, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] has not reported from his committee and recommended that there be two additional cavalry regiments provided?

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Military Affairs, which is the final arbiter in such matters so far as this House is concerned, reported a bill which was passed by the House reducing the number of cavalry regiments to eight. I hope the amendment increasing the number of cavalry regiments will not be adopted.

Mr. HURLBUT. This section 6 contains some of the most important changes that are proposed to be made in the organization of the Army. I will ask the House to bear with me, although I may be outside of the strict rules of order, in speaking of the different propositions which are made here, and showing what, in my judgment, will be the conveniences and inconveniences of the changes proposed.

The present number of cavalry regiments in the United States Army is ten, of artillery regiments five, and of infantry regiments twenty-five; a total of forty regiments. The proposition in this bill is to reduce the ten regiments of cavalry to eight and to reduce artillery and infantry to twenty-three. It is a very bad style of legislation to legislate in that way, because you must leave the discretion of reduction in the two arms, not fixing it by the House, to the Secretary of War. I have said repeatedly in the House—and I do not know there is any use of my saying it again—that, to cover the country we are compelled to cover and garrison our sea-coast and fortresses on the Gulf, to attend to our Pacific slope fortresses, to look after the Indian borders, we cannot get along probably with less than 25,000 effective men; and 25,000 effective men, as every officer's experience shows, means practically an Army of 30,000 enlisted men.

Now, sir, I have here returns of the regular Army, showing where all these troops are posted. I was utterly astonished to hear my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] take the ground he did. I can imagine no reason why a company of infantry should be in his district except to aid in the collection of revenue from illicit whisky. [Laughter.] I do not know of any other reason, as his district is celebrated in that line.

He complains there is a company at Newport Barracks. He knows that Newport Barracks is and has been for the last thirty years a recruiting station.

I want at this time to do away with the notion there is any overshadowing cloud of force resting upon the Southern States so far as the regular Army of the United States is concerned. There is to-day of the regular Army in the whole of the Southern States only sixteen hundred and twenty-four men, and I am not inclined to insult anybody by supposing that scattered force is there as a threat against that population.

We have clamors coming up to us, and just ones, from the Texas frontier. There is a line of four hundred miles in which the authority of the United States is defied every day. Neither life nor property nor pursuit of labor is safe in all that belt of country. It is practically at the mercy of an undisciplined, marauding band of Mexican savages. It is a disgrace and a reproach to the Government. I do not wonder, therefore, gentlemen from Texas ask that the cavalry force should be increased by the addition of two regiments. I do not think it is necessary to do that. I think that ten regiments of cavalry, if you give the Executive power to recruit them to the full strength of twelve hundred men, would cover all our dangerous frontier.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to reduction of the Army at all. If in the great zeal and patriotic ardor for economy it must be reduced, I hope the House will so reduce it that as little injury as possible will result to those sections that are very inadequately protected, and have been to an extent and for a length of time, in the language of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, as to make it a disgrace and reproach to the Government.

When gentlemen speak of there not being a necessity for as many troops as heretofore, they seem to overlook the changed condition of the country and especially the changed policy in reference to the use of troops. When the frontiers were as before, the condition of the Indian service did not necessitate by one half as many soldiers as at the present time. We have undertaken, and probably wisely, to control by military presence the Indians. Hence we find the great body of the Army employed in that duty. There is imminent necessity for them in the extreme Northwest, where the Sioux are now threatening war. A large portion of the Army is employed in New Mexico and Arizona, and some considerable number in the Indian Territory. I believe seven or eight companies are employed at Fort Sill.

At an early day of this session, in company with my colleagues, I called upon the President. We laid before him the facts, which were not unknown to him, with reference to the condition of affairs on our Mexican frontier; that along the Rio Grande, from its mouth to a distance of over four hundred miles in the interior, a citizen of the United States had no protection for life or person; that in many instances our citizens were compelled to abandon their property and seek safety in little towns and villages. His reply was that he had no disposable force suitable for that purpose; that if he had cavalry sufficient he would like to put it there; that it was disposed as well as it could be, in the judgment of those having charge of that branch of the service; that if he had the power he would properly mount and arm the infantry, thus giving to that exposed frontier protection.

This subject has been one of most laborious investigation by a committee of this House at this session. The report of its labors has been lying on members' desks for two months, and those who have had the inclination to look at it must feel that we have had cause for war with Mexico almost any day for the last ten years, and even before that time.

At present there is a little lull and cessation of incursions in that immediate section of the country by reason of the fact that a revolution has been going on on the other side of the Rio Grande, which has given employment to the desperadoes and marauders who have heretofore been engaged on our frontier. That is about over, and we cannot doubt that the incursions will be resumed, probably with increased force and determination. Cortina, the chief of the band of robbers, has made his escape, and will make his return to his fastnesses in Tamaulipas, and he will make an effort to re-imburse himself for his losses during the length of time he has been in captivity.

The fact that a company has been stationed in Kentucky to look after their crooked whisky, and perhaps for another purpose, is no reason why a district or country larger than Kentucky, which is now or has been virtually occupied by a hostile force, an armed body of men, sometimes actually under officers wearing the uniform of a foreign government, shall not receive protection from the strong arm of the United States. If that company had interfered in that domestic broil of which we were told, I think we should have heard some complaint on the subject; and I believe the officer only discharged his duty in declining to act.

But I see nothing in that as a reason why protection should not be given to that portion of the country which is suffering such terrible disaster and loss. An amount of property is yearly destroyed of far greater value than the amounts that it is proposed here to save. Texas has a bill to pay at the end of the year of from $400,000 to $600,000. We simply ask that justice shall be meted out to us and that the Army shall be preserved in a state of efficiency.

Mr. BANNING. This question was very thoroughly considered in the Military Committee, and that committee came to the conclusion that the Army was small enough. I believe that conclusion was correct, and the House adopted that conclusion in adopting the bill. Now my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] when he complains of the waste of the force of the Army in his State, I fear has not measured well the strength that is wasted there. I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a statement of troops that are now in the Southern States, and I will read it. There are in Louisiana 701, in Mississippi 336, in Florida 243, in North Carolina 226, in South Carolina 522, in Georgia 317, in Alabama 222, in Tennessee 205, in Kentucky 112.

Mr. HURLBUT. Send that statement to the desk and have it read.

Mr. BANNING. These are the soldiers at present in the Southern States, except on the frontier. Our Army is pretty well distributed. There are only 112 in Kentucky. At the present time our Army is well occupied and hard worked in the Indian wars and in defending the Texas frontier.

The Military Committee have reported a bill in favor of reducing the cavalry regiments to eight and the infantry regiments to twenty. This was a reduction that made the force more available and more useful. It put all the cavalry force that we now have into eight regiments, and left room for six hundred more, making that branch of the service more useful and less expensive.

Mr. Chairman, the great difficulty with our Army, against which gentlemen strike so often, is not in its number of fighting men, but in its number of officers. Why, sir, in an executive document which has just come into this House, (No. 174,) I discover that we have paid to officers of the Army in this city of Washington alone since 1869 the large sum of $2,207,720.59.

Mr. DUNNELL. How have they been employed?

Mr. BANNING. They have been employed in Washington defending the capital.

Mr. HANCOCK. How many?

Mr. BANNING. I cannot give the number at this moment, but it is here in the document which I have before me.

I think with my friend from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] that this reduction of the fighting force of the Army at this time is a mistake. Gentlemen should take into consideration that we have not only the Indian wars to put down, but we have the Texas frontier to protect, which is daily threatened; and not only is threatened but Mexicans are actually coming over and robbing our citizens and killing our people upon our own soil. And when this is being done it is, in my opinion, an unsuitable time to reduce the Army.

In addition to this we have now over four thousand miles of railroad built in and through the Indian country that has no protection, save and except what the Army gives. Now, if we cut off and reduce the officers and thus reduce the expenses, we do well; but when we reduce the men I believe that we are guilty of a great mistake; that it is not statesmanship to do it; that it is not right to do it. And I fear that before we come back here again we may find that we have made a mistake in so doing.

As to the forces that should be reduced, I agree with my friend from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] that what we need in this country is cavalry and artillery; artillery to protect the sea-coast and cavalry to hunt down the Indian.

Mr. RANDALL. Who is attacking the sea-coast at this time?

Mr. BANNING. No one, I believe. But you in your bill provide for the reduction of the artillery regiments, without taking into consideration that it takes years to make artillery and that it takes years to make cavalry, while the reduction of the infantry may be supplied in a very short time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. Will it be in order to offer an amendment now to strike out the whole of section 6?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that it is first in order for the committee to have an opportunity to perfect the section of the bill before the question is taken on striking it out.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to state that at the proper time, when it is in order, I shall offer an amendment to strike out the whole of that section. I trust that this House will not be guilty of such a wrong to the people of Texas as to reduce the Army at the present time from forty regiments to thirty-one. Such an act would be equivalent to a declaration of war by the House of Representatives against the people whom the delegates from Texas represent upon this floor. It would simply be putting this House in line with the foreigners who make invasions upon her soil and make war upon her people.

It is known to the House that the State of Texas is now maintaining a regular army for the defense of its people against invasion from Mexico, and has been doing that for years. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that this question was maturely considered in committee, and this reduction made after mature consideration is justified in the sight of the American people.

What considerations could have entered into the deliberations or discussions of that committee that could have authorized them to come to the conclusion to muster out nine of the regiments of the Army at a time when Texas is knocking at the doors of the Government and asking for more troops? You proposed an amendment to the existing law to reduce the number of infantry and artillery regiments to twenty-three, which amendment leaves it at the discretion of the Secretary of War to have all the regiments of artillery or all of infantry. It does not seem to me that this could have been maturely considered. Not only is the number of regiments reduced; when the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] passed a few days ago reducing the number of regiments, he assured the House that the number of men in the lesser number of regiments would remain the same. But in the bill of the Committee on Appropriations they reduce the fighting force of this Government to 22,000 men instead of 25,000.

Now, General Sherman told us at the last session of Congress that if there was a reduction of the force of the Army it must necessarily come from the Texas frontier. Now what will be the pitiable position of the people of Texas when the three thousand men, the extent to which this bill reduces the Army, are withdrawn from the Texas frontier? You impose upon the State of Texas the duty of raising additional forces and maintaining them out of their own resources. Is that right? Why did they come into the Union if they are to maintain themselves against all foreign powers? One of the main reasons why States come into this alliance is to gather additional strength to maintain themselves against all foreign powers.

I am very much afraid, Mr. Chairman, that we have indulged this idea of economy in this House until it has become a mania, and we are always talking about economy. Why, sir, you may save every dollar you now spend by dissolving the Government entirely. That would be economy, and you could save two or three hundred millions of dollars a year by it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that there is any subject upon which the general judgment of the country is so well made up, and conclusively made up, as is that judgment which favors a reduction of the Army, provided the frontier of the country is properly protected. Now, in reference to fixing the number of cavalry regiments, we fixed at eight in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs. We then fixed the number of infantry and artillery regiments at two less than the number fixed by the Committee on Military Affairs, because of a subsequent reduction of the number of enlisted men, and we left it, as indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] to the discretion of the Secretary of War whether we should have four or five artillery regiments. My impression was, from information I had received, that four regiments of artillery were quite sufficient.

Now, sir, as to the reduction of the force of the Army to 23,000 men. When I came here I was prepared to vote for a much larger reduction, but the Indian troubles have induced me in a measure to change my views in that respect; but I will tell the gentleman why, as one member of that committee, I fixed the reduction of the force at three thousand as the number that could be dispensed with. The very figures given by the gentleman from North Carolina indicate that in nine States of this Union there are garrisoned three thousand men; in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and Kentucky. There are in those States three thousand men garrisoned. I, as one member of the Committee on Appropriations, deemed that the services of those three thousand soldiers could be dispensed with.

Now, mark you, this has no relation to Texas. There are thirty-three hundred soldiers in Texas, and I have not spoken at all of the Army quartered in the North or on the sea-coast. What necessity is there for an Army on the sea-coast? Who is attacking it? Are we in danger of attack upon the sea-border from any nation on the earth?

Now what I want is so to reduce our Army that it shall be exclusively applied to the frontier, where there is occasion for an Army. In my judgment there is occasion for an Army nowhere else. I hope, therefore, that the reduction proposed by the Committee on Appropriations will be adhered to, and that these three thousand men that are now in States able themselves to protect their own citizens without calling upon the United States for assistance will be taken off from the expense of the Government during the next fiscal year.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope that no reduction of any part of the Army will be made. The case of Texas is an obvious appeal for more men than she now has. We cannot measure our present necessities by our past history, especially our ante-war history.

We now have a system of internal taxes, onerous, oppressive, and exasperating, one which requires the maintenance of troops in many sections of the country to enforce it, not only in the fastnesses of the South, for in the city of Brooklyn Government troops have had to clear out the crooked stills and to fight the people in the streets, who were pelting them with stones and other missiles. I reply to my colleague that this system of internal taxation is the enemy that necessitates the maintenance of a force of infantry along the seacoast.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Not now; when I get through my five minutes I will hear the gentleman.

History repeats itself. We are now living over again the history of England between 1819 and 1823. It required her troops, infantry and cavalry, to hold in order her starving working-people. Our Bristol and Peterloo may come to us, if from now till the 1st of January, 1879, we continue to close workshops, factories, mines, forges, and furnaces as we have since the passage of the resumption act.

Millions of our people are already without employment. During the last eighteen months many of them have had to live upon their savings. Many of them started into that brief period owning their homes. They were well clad; they had many things which the auctioneer might sell, or on which the pawnbroker would advance money. The number of small depositors in savings-banks shrinks away week by week. The total deposits in the savings-banks are taking a retrograde movement and showing a diminution. The workingmen's homes are being sold at sheriff's sale in my city by the tens and by the hundreds. The furniture in their homes is diminishing; their apparel is exhausted. Already in Indianapolis, a fact to which I had occasion to call the attention of the House the other day, the people are asking how they may protect themselves against armed bands of idle and hungry workingmen.

Nearly three years more of this horrible life lies before us. I warn my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] that any economy that will prevent the Government from doing as the British government did, ride down the starving people with dragoons, bayonet them by the infantry, and force them into submission to legal robbery, may, if the resumption act is to be maintained and enforced, deprive the Government of the power to enforce the law.

But if the resumption act should be repealed, if we quit burdening the community with increased taxes for the purchase of silver for small change, and give them the currency they once had, a medium of exchange sufficient in volume to enable the employer to buy labor, and the laborer, having sold his skill and knowledge, to pay for and consume the products of others, we may escape the need of an army in our manufacturing centers. But, on the other hand, if the financial legislation now prevailing is to be maintained, I warn my colleague and all other mad economists against depriving the Government of power to maintain order in our mining and manufacturing interests.

Mr. RANDALL. We do not want to employ the Army against the poor.

Mr. REAGAN. What we should do is to make all proper reductions in the expenditures of the Government. In making those reductions, however, we should look to the practical necessities of our people.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] suggests that on looking over the distribution of the present military force of the United States he finds that there are some three thousand troops stationed along through the Southern States where there are no Indians, no hostile enemy; and he supposes that we could well dispense with that number of troops. But whatever may be the cause of the present distribution of the troops a reduction of the force by the number suggested by him will not, I apprehend, have the effect of taking them away from the Southern States. If it would do so I would agree cheerfully to support the reduction. But we cannot, at least for the present year, under the policy which has been pursued by the existing Administration, expect that the troops will be taken away from those States.

Some of them may be necessary for ordinary purposes, as has been suggested, for the purpose of enforcing our revenue laws. Others may be used there for other purposes which I will not now spe k of, because they are not material to the object I have in view.

If we look for what constitutes the real necessity for troops, we will find it is the protection of the people on our frontiers. When we compare the present military necessities with those of the past, we ought not to lose sight of some material facts. One of them is, that by the extension of railroads across the continent, by the advancement of isolated settlements into the different Territories, we have not only not shortened the pre-existing exposed frontiers, but we have increased the extent of frontier settlements which demand protection at the hands of the Government.

We cannot therefore expect, if the Army has done its duty in the past, as we presume it has, that it can do the same duty with a less number of troops or with the same efficiency when greater service is required.

There is a demand for troops not only along the Texas border but in the neighborhood of the Sioux Indians and elsewhere in the Territories. The Indians, on account of encroachments of white settlements upon their territory and on account of their disturbed condition, are restless and disposed in many instances to be hostile. I trust we will in a spirit of humanity deal with that problem, but we must be so prepared as to protect our people.

My colleagues have called the attention of the House to the fact of the actual condition of war which has continued along the Texas border upon the Rio Grande for ten years past. Evidence has been submitted by which it is shown that millions and millions of dollars' worth of property have been destroyed, and hundreds of citizens, not only private citizens but officers of the Government, have lost their lives for lack of sufficient defense and protection on the part of the Government. I concede, so far as protection upon our border against Indians is concerned, it has been better for the last two or three years than for a long time before, but it is not as efficient as desired and as efficient as it ought to be.

In addition to what the Government spends for the protection of our frontier against Mexicans and Indians, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that up to the 23d of December last the government of Texas has paid out $1,536,489 for the defense of her borders. It has not yet been re-imbursed to the State of Texas. I take it that it is better the Government should take the defense of the frontier into its own hands by its own troops than to drive Texas or any other State at its own expense to protect the frontier and then to remain for a long time without being re-imbursed. We owe it to the people, as it was suggested a while ago, in a government like ours, that our citizens ought not only to feel proud of their citizenship, but to feel absolutely secure of the protection of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the argument presented with much force as coming from the Texas frontier can be fully met, while at the same time the reduction proposed by this bill can be made. In other words, I hope the Army can be substantially reduced to 22,000 men, and at the same time the cavalry force, the important force for the protection of the frontier, can be kept up so as to prevent any loss of protection which the Government ought to afford to that section of the Union.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] stated that General Sherman, in discussing this subject, had said that a reduction of the Army meant a reduction of protection to the frontier of Texas. That was what he stated, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. MILLS. He so stated to me: "You have most of the troops in your State, and a reduction of the Army must mean a reduction of that force."

Mr. HOLMAN. That meant that a reduction of the Army would be a reduction of the cavalry force. Now it is clear to my mind that the Army may be reduced to 22,000 men without any reduction of the cavalry force, and yet every facility for protection furnished that Texas or any other section might desire.

I think I am entirely safe, Mr. Chairman, in saying there are five thousand men east of the Mississippi River. The gentleman from Texas has studied this subject more thoroughly than I have, and if I am not correct, he will please correct me. I think I am entirely safe in saying that east of the Mississippi River there are at this time five thousand men. There are posts at the eastern extremity of Lake Superior, at Mackinaw, at Detroit, and at Port Huron, and a long series of posts in the northwestern section or the Union, remote from the Indian frontier, and not required for any purpose of defense, where the number of companies range from two to seven in the aggregate. I think I am safe in saying that at least five thousand men are now stationed where they are not required for any military service. Suppose it is necessary, as was suggested by the gentleman a little while ago, that they will be needed for the enforcement of our revenue laws, suppose it should happen in some portion of the country it should be necessary to use some of our soldiers for that purpose, an event to be regretted and deplored, yet I do not think any one will be willing to agree there would be any necessity for having so many as five thousand men for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS. My colleague stated that when the Texas delegation called upon the President to ask him for protection of the frontier, he stated that he had no disposable force to afford any more protection than was given to the frontier of Texas. The gentleman from Indiana must remember that force on the east side of the Mississippi River is to be continued. The only question, then, is, if you are going to reduce the Army, are you going to take away the protection we now have upon our frontier?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why maintain the posts with five thousand men to the east of the Mississippi, where they are not required for any military service?

Mr. MILLS. That is a question between you and the President of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have troops stationed at Detroit, Port Huron, and at Mackinaw, in Michigan.

Mr. HURLBUT. Does the gentleman wish to know why?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope I will be allowed a single moment to make a suggestion.

I only wish to say that in point of fact, without reference to the motive, there are on the east side of the Mississippi at least five thousand men. I have not been able to see any detailed statement for the last two years showing the exact number in the various posts east of the Mississippi River. But, judging from the numbers two years ago, I think I am entirely safe in saying that there are at least five thousand men now east of the Mississippi River. If that be true, the only question with reference to the protection of the frontier of Texas as to the military demands of the country is what should be the character of this force.

Now I desire to submit this proposition more as a proposition than as an amendment, that the cavalry regiments be limited to ten and the infantry and artillery regiments to twenty. The question as to the number of men, whether 25,000 or 22,000, is not involved in this proposition. That comes up when that portion of the paragraph is reached. I ask the gentleman from Texas if that would not be entirely satisfactory?

Mr. HANCOCK. That is the number now, and the President stated that he was not able to give more men for the service on the frontier.

Mr. HOLMAN. Having consulted with the other gentlemen who have been concerned in preparing this bill, I make the motion—I believe it can be put as an amend ment to the pending proposition—that the cavalry regiments be ten and the number of artillery and infantry regiments twenty. I offer that as an amendment to the substitute now pending.

Mr. HURLBUT. If my friend from Indiana desires to know the manner in which the Army is distributed I will be happy to furnish him the information. As a matter of fact all the ten cavalry regiments of the United States are now in active service on the frontier; every one of them. Every man that they can carry is in active service on the frontier, either the Indian or the southwestern frontier.

The gentleman from Indiana asked why troops are required at Detroit and at Port Huron. I will tell him. These are the points to which regiments that are exhausted and depleted by having been in southern climates are returned every four years or every three years in order to recruit.

My friend from Philadelphia talks about the artillery. Why, sir, this Government has established a line of fortresses at vast cost all along our coast, and to-day there are not men enough to police and take care of those great and costly fortresses. Gentlemen ask what danger is there of an attack on the sea-coast? I do not know that there is any now. But is it economy to allow those great works to fall to pieces that cover New York and that cover Philadelphia? Or do they consider it more economical to remove the troops whose duty it is to garrison them, and have that work done by men hired by the Ordnance and Engineer Departments in the most costly way it can be done?

The conclusion, to my mind, is inevitable, from looking over as carefully and as conscientiously as I can the disposition of the present force of the Army of the United States, that any reduction whatsoever of the effective force of our Army is a mistake, and involves serious danger. The Committee on Appropriations in this case, as in all others, have proceeded not only without warrant, but without authority. They have not followed either the existing law or the proposed law.

Mr. RANDALL. I would remind the gentleman that the Army was reduced by a republican House very much in this way. We are following the line of that example.

Mr. HURLBUT. Not exactly. Your Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill which was passed here by a strong majority for the reduction of the Army. But it expressly forbade the reduction of a single musket or a single saber. And now the Committee on Appropriations has gone on not only to reduce the number of regiments below what was proposed by the committee that had that matter in charge, but to strike off three thousand more men from the effective force of the Army; and they have done it at their own peril and risk.

Mr. BANNING. If the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his amendment I will renew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BANNING. I renew it.

I desire to point out to my friend from Indiana the mistake he makes in his amendment, and I hope the gentleman from Texas will agree with me. As I have already stated and as I repeat again now, the great difficulty in the matter of expense is not in the fighting portion of the Army, but in the officers. Some of the companies are scarcely a corporal's guard.

Mr. HANCOCK. We are satisfied with the proposition of the Military Committee, and only ask the Committee on Military Affairs to stand to it.

Mr. BANNING. We do stand to it. And I wish to say to my friend from Indiana that the present organization of cavalry regiments would permit the increase of six hundred, or, as I have said, six hundred and fifty-seven more men, and then they would not be full. The Military Committee reduced the number by two, in order to do away with the expense of two regimental headquarters and twenty company headquarters, and so as to permit the filling up and strengthening of the regiments and the companies as has been recommended by General Sheridan and the most of our Army officers. This, I think, was a proper reduction to make. It sustains the cavalry force as strong in men as it now is, and admits of its being made stronger. It then reduces the number of infantry regiments, and makes some that now have only one hundred or one hundred and twenty men and companies that have only four or five, stronger in fighting force. I believe that was correct. And my friend from Indiana proposes an amendment that carries us back to the ridiculous position of an army of officers in place of an Army of men. Now, I do not think that with this understanding he will insist upon his amendment. I believe with the gentleman from Texas that we need this cavalry force, and that as arranged in the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs, it will be more useful to the frontier than if an increase be made in the number of regiments. Therefore I hope the matter will be allowed to stand in that shape. The only difference between the bill of the Committee on Appropriations and our own is the reduction of the number of regiments and a reduction of three thousand in the number of troops. This reduction will not, to any great extent, take place before December, though I do not think that is correct. The worst feature, however, of this bill is the possible reduction of our artillery. We had better make a reduction in the infantry of five, six, or eight regiments than dispense with a single regiment of either cavalry or artillery, because this part of our Army can be made useful only by age and experience; and this is the part of the Army we most need.

Mr. RANDALL. Why, then, does the gentleman recommend a reduction to eight regiments?

Mr. BANNING. I have told the gentleman that we recommend a reduction to eight cavalry regiments because if all the cavalry force we now have be put into eight regiments we have room for six hundred and fifty-seven more men than we now have in ten regiments.

Mr. RANDALL. Then we have only to provide for filling up to the maximum eight cavalry regiments.

Mr. BANNING. Yes, sir; we have only to provide for that.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I do not rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] neither am I quite prepared to advocate a reduction of the force of the Army. I am very much inclined to think, however, that there are but two purposes for which the United States need an Army at present, namely, the protection of the Texas frontier and the care of the Indians.

My particular object in rising is, if possible, to relieve the anxiety of the "father of the House," the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in respect to the necessity of maintaining our Army in order to enforce the resumption act, and I wish to give him on this point an easy problem to settle. Within the last ten days, in the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New York, where money is abundant, there have occurred and been noted in the public prints several first-class commercial disasters, which are only the principal ones, there having been many others of which no notice had appeared in the newspapers. A first-class manufacturing establishment in Massachusetts, with $2,500,000 of capital paid up, has failed. A first-class commercial establishment in New York City, owing $1,600,000, has failed. The great Sprague Manufacturing Company of Rhode Island, with a capital of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, has closed all its mills. A savings-bank in New York City, which had $1,900,000 of deposits on the 1st day of January, has failed. And now the point which I address to the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that if he will institute an honest and careful investigation in regard to each and every one of those disasters he will discover that the resumption act had no more to do with either of them than it had to do with the death of the late Sultan of Turkey; not a bit more.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentlemen tell us what had anything to do with them?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Certainly, if you will give me time. I am familiar with the cases.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] does not see that the facts he adduced make out my case, Omnipotence cannot give him the power to perceive the relation of cause and effect.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I re-affirm my position; and if the gentleman will take the trouble to investigate, he will find that I am right, without the least mistake.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe I will withdraw my amendment. I desire, however, to say that if the ten regiments proposed in this amendment, reducing the infantry and artillery down to twenty regiments, would be satisfactory to the gentlemen who represent the Texas frontier, I should, so far as my own vote is concerned, be strongly inclined to adopt the amendment in that form. But it does not seem to me that the gentlemen from Texas have any special desire about this matter. The bill as already passed by the House fixed the number of cavalry regiments at eight; and there was no special objection to it at the time of its passage.

Mr. HANCOCK. But those regiments were required to be filled up to the maximum number.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be borne in mind that this does not affect the reduction of the force down to 22,000, inasmuch as that is involved in a subsequent proposition.

But the argument presented to-day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] even if it were offered in a spirit of badinage, that it is possible in a government like ours for an Army to be kept up for the purpose of overawing the people, is, to my mind, the strongest reason why the doctrine of our fathers that in time of peace the Army should be reduced to the smallest possible number, and should be used only for the purpose of protecting the frontiers against the Indians, should be solemnly maintained. That argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, even if it were uttered, as I hope it was, in the spirit of pleasantry, makes me tremble when I contemplate the fact that there are five thousand men of our Army east of the Mississippi River; and if I thought it possible that in this Government of ours, in this centennial year, the organized Army (not the militia force drawn from the body of the people) could be required to be used for the enforcement of the laws of the land, I should in this centennial year feel——

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman in this centennial year permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. I should feel that we were not entering upon a century of peace and prosperity, but a century in which the bayonet would play its part in the civil administration of the Government.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HOLMAN. I have treated the gentleman from Pennsylvania courteously, and though he always speaks admirably, I hope he will allow me to finish my sentence.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania make a pro forma amendment?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir; I move to amend by striking out the last two words. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana for a brief answer to this question: whether he supposes that the fathers of the country ever contemplated that Congress would by adroit legislation prohibit laborers from following their honest employments and doom them to destitution; whether he thinks the fathers believed that under our republican institutions the laboring mass would become such inborn slaves that if thus oppressed they would offer no protest or resistance?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very glad that the gentleman has asked me that question; I will answer it with very great pleasure. It is a happy reflection that in the end of this century we can call to mind that the purpose of our fathers was to organize a government "of the people"——

Mr. KELLEY. So I supposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. "By the people"——

Mr. KELLEY. So I supposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. "And for the people."

Mr. KELLEY. And not for capitalists alone.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not a government resting on the bayonet, but on the sovereign will of the people.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir; that is in the Cincinnati platform. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I say further, that our fathers——

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. KELLEY. I would further ask my friend from Indiana——

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me to finish my answer to one question before he asks another.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] rises to a point of order.

Mr. KELLEY. Are not a majority of the working-people——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order.

Mr. KELLEY. Is my time out?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order because, as the Chair has stated, the gentleman from Tennessee has risen to a point of order.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg pardon. I did not hear the Chair in the tumult. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will state his point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. My point of order is that there is no question before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the debate between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the last clause of the pending proposition.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I accept that amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have been fortunate at any rate in accomplishing one end, which is that the records of this hour shall not go down into the coming century bearing the expression of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] as a serious utterance. I would regret, and so would the gentleman from Pennsylvania—however by questionable legislation, by adroit measures in the interest of capital, labor may have been oppressed—that those who control the administration of this Government should in this centennial year encounter resistance of the law which would call for the exercise of the military power of the Government to suppress it. I regret that in this centennial year such an utterance, except in the spirit of pleasantry, should go upon our records and float down the coming century. Therefore I consider myself fortunate in having elicited the subsequent utterance of the gentleman showing that his original remark was not made seriously, and that he does not apprehend such resistance to the law as would justify the employment of military power; that he does not believe that in a Government like this the military power could be used to subdue the people. It cannot be done, and it will not be done.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit a brief and pertinent inquiry?

Mr. HOLMAN. It will have to be very brief.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it not true that 14,000 of the 26,000 working-people of Indianapolis, the capital of the gentleman's own State, are without employment, and many of them living on garbage?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; my friend puts the matter too strongly.

Mr. KELLEY. That information I get from the papers of Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust I have not heard the gentleman aright. I agree with him that the laboring masses of the people of this country are sorely oppressed, but——

Mr. KELLEY. The papers of the gentleman's own State testify that the unemployed workingmen gather decayed potatoes and other garbage from the fronts of stores and other places where they have been thrown.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is no doubt true that large numbers of people in that recently prosperous city have been thrown out of employment, and like men they have made their appeals to each other for help and like men they are standing shoulder to shoulder and furnishing aid and succor to each other. But, thank God, neither at Indianapolis nor elsewhere are the laboring-men of this country reduced to such a condition that they are not still able to stand up in the light of day feeling that they are men, with the surroundings of men and the rights of men.

Mr. KELLEY. I quote from their statements as published in the Indianapolis papers. One at least admitted editorially that a respectable, well-known, worthy workingman and his family had been living on garbage, on decayed potatoes thrown out from market stores.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise in order that the House may close debate on the pending section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will take back his imputation upon the people of my State. The magnanimity and brotherly feeling of the laboring masses themselves have not proved insufficient to protect the rights of labor there as well as elsewhere. Labor is not so oppressed that the fearful result stated by the gentleman has been reached.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that it is not necessary to remind the gentleman from Indiana that his remarks are not in order, the gentleman from Tennessee having moved that the committee rise in order that a motion may be made to close debate on the pending section.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his motion in order to allow my colleague [Mr. LANDERS] to be heard.

Mr. ATKINS. We shall never get through this bill if gentlemen are to discuss the currency question upon it.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ATKINS, it was agreed to; there being ayes 73, noes not counted.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumes the consideration of the Army appropriation bill all discussion on the pending section be closed in five minutes.

Mr. PAGE. Pending that motion, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] will not press that motion.

Mr. PAGE. O, yes; let us adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. The question now under consideration in Committee of the Whole is of more importance than all the other questions involved in the bill. I hope therefore that debate upon it will not be restricted to five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I would remind the gentleman from California that we have done nothing for three days with the distinct understanding that we should proceed with this bill to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. We yielded yesterday with the expectation that we should have to-day for the bill.

The motion of Mr. PAGE that the House adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. ATKINS that debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending section be closed in five minutes, it was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have not engaged the attention of this House to any great extent, and I regret the necessity of occupying its time now. I would not have thought of seeking the floor at all but for the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] I do not think that his statements are without authority, such as he refers to. He says that he has obtained his information from the papers of Indianapolis. I presume there are some papers there that are anxious to get up a sensation, though it be at the expense of the city; but it is not true that the people of Indianapolis are in such a destitute condition as is represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is true that Indianapolis has been improving very rapidly, and large numbers of workingmen have been attracted there, especially during the past year, when that city was prosperous while other cities were not. It was understood, Mr. Chairman, that there was some destitution in that city, that some laboring-men were out of employment and had no means of support. The authorities of the city called a meeting and made arrangements under which they have commenced improvements on the public works. They have invited every workingman to come forward that needed labor for the support of his family, and all that have applied have obtained employment. When the call was made about four hundred responded.

It was agreed by the citizens of Indianapolis that they would give employment to all laboring-men having families; and that they would encourage the young men who were needy to leave the city and seek employment in the country, as the farmers in many places could employ them; that those desiring to leave should be furnished with money to enable them to do so. This is the arrangement that has been made at Indianapolis; and I will say that so far as I know (and I am in communication with Indianapolis daily) there is no destitution there at this time that is not provided for.

As to the cause which has produced this embarrassment, I agree with declarations often made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY;] that is, "that of contraction of the currency," which was the immediate result of the resumption act. I regret this condition of affairs as much as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but do not wish it exaggerated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] which will be read.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] made a motion to strike out the last clause, and I accepted that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to make a merely formal amendment for the purpose of submitting remarks.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I stated that I accepted the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. According to the understanding of the Chair, the amendment was formal and was withdrawn at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Then I renew it for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the committee the increase of cavalry force.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that under the direction of the House debate has been closed.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Have I not the right to answer the remark made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the Texas delegation made no objection to the reduction of the cavalry force to eight regiments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must state that under the order of the House he cannot tolerate any debate.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I wish to say that on the contrary the Texas delegation did make objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas will be read.

Mr. HANCOCK. The Chair will permit me to state that my colleague [Mr. SCHLEICHER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] have agreed upon the substitution of ten regiments for twelve.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] will indicate the form in which he modifies his amendment.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I modify it by inserting "ten" instead of "twelve" and by striking out the concluding clause.

The amendment, as modified, was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "is hereby reduced to eight" and insert the words "shall hereafter be ten."

Mr. RANDALL. That is what it is now.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SCHLEICHER, as modified, there were—ayes 34, noes 64; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHLEICHER and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 27, noes 58.

The CHAIRMAN. If no further count be demanded, the amendment will be regarded as negatived.

Mr. HANCOCK. I demand a further count.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to make the point of order that no quorum has voted?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it becomes the duty of the Chair to direct the roll to be called, that the absentees may be reported to the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move that the committee rise, in order that the House may adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I am sorry that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] will not allow us to go on.

Mr. HURLBUT. Well, it is late anyhow; we had better adjourn, and take up the bill again in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw the point of order, that the question may be taken on the motion that the committee rise?

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to call attention to the fact that when we next go into Committee of the Whole amendments only will be in order to this section, the House having cut off further debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The order of the House was that debate on this section should be closed at the end of five minutes, which time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. That is what I wanted to impress upon members, so that they may see that by an adjournment they will not gain any time for debate.

Mr. HURLBUT. The order of the House was that debate should be closed on the paragraph; only the first paragraph.

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; on the pending section.

The CHAIRMAN. The order of the House was that debate should be closed on this section. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Texas to make a point of order upon the fact that no quorum has voted?

Mr. HANCOCK. I merely wish a further count.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that, if he demands a further count, it becomes the duty of the Chair to order the roll to be called, that the names of absentees may be noted, so that the committee may rise and report them to the House.

Mr. HANCOCK. I want a further count to-day or some other day. There is no quorum here, or a quorum is not disposed to vote; so probably we had better rise and adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman then does not insist on the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. Has the gentleman from Texas any objection to the committee rising?

Mr. HANCOCK. None in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] move that the committee rise?

Mr. ATKINS. I do.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CARE OF THE ROOF OF THE HALL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

WASHINGTON, June 15, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to state that, in obedience to the order of the House of the 10th instant directing the Clerk of the House "to inquire into the cause of the interruption of its proceedings of that date by the breaking of a pane of glass in the ceiling of the Hall and to report the facts to the House with such recommendation as may prevent a recurrence of the accident," I have carefully inquired into the circumstances attending the accident in question, and find the facts to be as follows:

The Engineer of the House had sent one of the employés in his department to the ceiling to remove some pools of water which had been driven in by the storm just then past, and which, if permitted to remain, would have continued to leak upon the floor of the House and upon the heads and desks of its members, and while thus employed the accident occurred.

Positive instructions have been given not hereafter to allow any one under any circumstances to pass over the ceiling of the House during its sessions; and it is respectfully suggested that a permanent rule of the House to that effect would, in view of the changes which may hereafter occur in the officers of the House, be the best protection against similar occurrences in the future.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

No person shall be allowed to enter the room over the Hall of the House when the House is in session. The Clerk of the House is charged with the enforcement of this rule.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House adjourn.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for three minutes for a personal explanation.

Mr. ATKINS. I will do so.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, as my name has been mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS,] I desire to say that my statements with reference to the condition of the workingmen of Indianapolis were derived from what appeared to me to be reputable and well-established papers, published in that city, one of which had sent a commissioner (to use its own language) through the workshops and reported by trades and callings the number of men that had been employed, the number now employed, and the number that consequently were in idleness. It also stated the reduced rates at which the greatly reduced numbers were working. I have seen other papers from the same city, generally confirming these statements. A meeting of the workingmen was held and its proceedings were characterized by the most excellent order and by the utterance of none but proper and peaceful sentiments.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that this is no "personal explanation."

Mr. KELLEY. I think it is when my statements have been challenged; but in one minute I shall be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. But should not the gentleman from Pennsylvania have known that in view of the generosity of the population of Indiana such a statement as he made was absolutely impossible to be true?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. KELLEY. I have been allowed three minutes, and I shall be through in a moment.

At the meeting to which I just referred a mechanic, who was indorsed by the papers editorially as a man of respectability, stated that he and his family had lived for days on decayed potatoes found at the door of a store.

Mr. RANDALL. Thank Heaven, there are none living in that way in Philadelphia.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. STONE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, indefinitely, on account of illness;

To Mr. MILLIKEN for ten days on account of sickness;

To Mr. MAGOON for ten days on account of important business;

To Mr. EGBERT indefinitely; and

To Mr. SPENCER till Monday morning next.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. COX for the withdrawal from the files of the House of papers connected with the claim of James R. D. Morrison.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. HOOKER to append to the printed report of his remarks made yesterday a synopsis of the laws of certain States referred to by him.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A petition for the relief of J. W. Lawless; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2925) making provision for the payment for a horse to George A. Lemert, late a captain in Company F, Ninety-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the war of 1861.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, memorials, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. JONES of Kentucky: The petition of J. D. Allen, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PACKER: The petition of Mrs. Mary A. Edelen, for an increase of pension, to the same committee.

Also, remonstrance of citizens of Northumberland County, Pennsylvania, against a reduction of the tariff, and asking that the tariff laws may remain unchanged, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. RICE: The petition of T. Worthington, late colonel of the Forty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of James Co, for a pension, and for compensation for services rendered the United States in the war of 1812, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. SPRINGER: The petition of Phœbe M. Tayloe, for a rehearing of her claim for corn furnished the United States Army, rejected by the southern claims commission, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, memorial of citizens of Des Moines Valley, Iowa, in reference to certain lands in that State, to the Committee on Public Lands.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 17, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the following acts, having been received by the President on the 3d of June and not having been returned by him to the Senate within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become laws without his signature:

An act (S. No. 3) for the relief of Alvis Smith;

An act (S. No. 43) granting a pension to Urial Bundy;

An act (S. No. 121) granting a pension to John Pierson; and

An act (S. No. 545) granting a pension to Julia Scroggin.

FAILURE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The near approach of a new fiscal year and the failure of Congress up to this time to provide the necessary means to continue all the functions of government, makes it my duty to call your attention to the embarrassments that must ensue if the fiscal year is allowed to close without remedial action on your part.

Article 1, section 9, of the Constitution declares:

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

To insure economy of expenditures and security of the public treasure, Congress has from time to time enacted laws to restrain the use of public moneys except for the specific purpose for which appropriated and within the time for which appropriated, and to prevent contracting debts in anticipation of appropriate appropriations.

Revised Statutes, section 3679, provides:

"No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations."

Section 3732 provides:

"No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made, unless the same is authorized by law or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments, for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year."

Section 3678, as follows:

"All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others."

Section 3690, that—

"All balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills, and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year, shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year, or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year; and balances not needed for such purposes shall be carried to the surplus fund. This section, however, shall not apply to appropriations known as permanent or indefinite appropriations."

The effect of the laws quoted, taken in connection with the constitutional provision referred to, is, as above stated, to prohibit any outlay of public money toward defraying even the current and necessary expenses of Government after the expiration of the year for which appropriated, excepting when those expenses are provided for by some permanent appropriation, and excepting in the War and Navy Departments, under section 3732.

The number of permanent appropriations are very limited, and cover but few of the necessary expenditures of the Government. They are nearly all, if not quite all, embraced in sections 3687, 3688, and 3689 of the Revised Statutes. That contained in section 3687 is applicable to expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, that in section 3688 to the payment of interest on the public debt, and that in section 3689 to various objects too numerous to detail here.

It will be observed that while section 3679, quoted above, provides that no Department shall in any one fiscal year involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of the appropriation for that year, section 3732, also quoted above, confers, by clear implication, upon the heads of the War and Navy Departments full authority, even in the absence of any appropriation, to purchase or contract for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation not exceeding the necessities of the current year. The latter provision is special and exceptional in its character, and is to be regarded as excluded from the operation of the former more general one. But if any of the appropriation bills above enumerated should fail to be matured before the expiration of the current fiscal year, the Government would be greatly embarrassed for want of the necessary funds to carry on the service. Precluded from expending money not appropriated, the Departments would have to suspend the service, so far as the appropriations for it should have failed to be made.

A careful examination of this subject will demonstrate the embarrassed condition all branches of the Government will be in—and especially the executive—if there should be a failure to pass the necessary appropriation bills before the 1st of July, or otherwise provide.

I commend this subject most earnestly to your consideration, and urge that some measure be speedily adopted to avert the evils which would result from non-action by Congress. I will venture the suggestion, by way of remedy, that a joint resolution, properly guarded, might be passed through the two Houses of Congress, extending the provisions of all appropriations for the present fiscal year to the next in all cases where there is a failure on the 1st of July to supply such appropriation; each appropriation so extended to hold good until Congress shall have passed a corresponding appropriation applicable to the new fiscal year, when all moneys expended under laws enacted for this fiscal year shall be deducted from the corresponding appropriation for the next.

To make my ideas on this subject more clear, I have caused to be drawn up a "joint resolution" embodying them more fully.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 17, 1876.

Joint resolution to provide for defraying temporarily the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service.

Whereas the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service in its various branches, comprising among others the expenses which especially pertain to the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government, to the consular and diplomatic service, to the postal service, to the support of the Army and to the maintenance of the Navy, are generally met by annual appropriations which expire at the end of the current fiscal year; and whereas no public funds will be available to defray these expenses as the same shall accrue after that period unless appropriations shall have been previously made therefor by law; and whereas to avoid the great embarrassment to the public service that might otherwise ensue it is expedient to make provision for defraying temporarily such of these expenses as would be unprovided for in case some one of the usual annual appropriation bills designed to provide therefor should fail to be matured by the end of the fiscal year now current: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case any of the following appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, shall not have passed by the commencement of such year, so that the funds to be appropriated thereby may then be available for expenditure, that is to say, the bill providing for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; the bill providing for the consular and diplomatic expenses; the bill providing for the service of the Post-Office Department; the bill providing for the support of the Army; and the bill providing for the naval service, the appropriation act for the current fiscal year corresponding in its general description and object to such appropriation bill shall extend to the fiscal year next ensuing until such appropriation bill is enacted and takes effect, to the end that the provisions of such appropriation act which apply to the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service for the current fiscal year shall in like manner be applicable to similar expenses which may accrue during the period intervening between the end of the current fiscal year and the time when such appropriation bill for the next ensuing fiscal year shall be enacted and take effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was going to suggest that it be printed and lie on the table, and in the mean time we can consider as to the best disposition to make of it.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that it be printed to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will give the Printer notice to have the message printed at once.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the communication ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations. I suppose that committee can at once consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations made the suggestion that it lie on the table for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will lie on the table and be printed, if there be no objection.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a protest from the leading men of the Osage Nation against the establishment of a territorial government over the Indian country, together with a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs forwarding the same to the Interior Department; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of citizens of Savannah, Georgia, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 3187 to amend title 53 of the Revised Statutes relating to merchant seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Andrew Lutz, late major of the Eighth New York Volunteers, praying to be allowed the pay due him as such officer from August 1, 1861, to November 22, 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of ship-owners of the port of New York, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 3187 to amend title 53 of the Revised Statutes relating to merchant seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented the petition of J. D. Allen, of Barnwell, South Carolina, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 923) authorizing the appointment of Acting Passed Assistant Surgeon Francis V. Greene as surgeon, and Acting Passed Assistant Surgeon Joseph J. Sowerby as assistant surgeon in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, pursuant to order legislative and executive business will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative business.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. There will be undoubtedly a quorum here in a very few moments. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire how many Senators voted a moment ago?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-five voted in trial.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not object to this proceeding, but I want to know as we go along.

Mr. WINDOM. I think there must be a quorum in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not aware how many Senators are in the Senate in legislative session. There were thirty-five who voted in trial.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill is of too much importance and involves too many questions of very serious moment to the country to be considered by less than a quorum of the Senate. I shall certainly object to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota unless a quorum is ascertained to be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects to proceeding with the bill unless there is a quorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. It might be taken up and read through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Minnesota insists on his motion, the Chair will order a call of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were on division—ayes 14, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PADDOCK, (when Mr. HITCHCOCK's name was called.) I desire to say for my colleague that he is too ill to be present in his seat.

Mr. WINDOM, (after having voted in the negative.) I vote "yea" with the understanding that there is not a quorum present. If there is a quorum here I shall vote "nay."

The call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Christiancy, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Booth, Cockrell, Conkling, Davis, Eaton, Ferry, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, and Whyte—16

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Wallace, West, and Withers—38.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 17, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., one of his secretaries.

PENSION AGENCY IN CHICAGO.

Mr. HURLBUT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, submitted a report on the pension agency at Chicago; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

FIRE-WORKS ON THE FOURTH OF JULY.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I hold in my hand a letter of great public interest but of doubtful relation to Federal business. I ask the indulgence of the House that it be read, and referred to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

NOS. 100 AND 102 BROADWAY, New York, June 12, 1876.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed circular of the National Board of Fire Underwriters upon the danger likely to arise by the use of fire-works in the coming celebration of the Fourth of July, of this year, indicates somewhat the anxiety upon the subject in insurance circles, but we fear that it may not command the public attention to the extent which its importance demands and which would follow the discussion of the subject in Congress. It may not strike you as being a proper subject to occupy the attention of the House, or it may be that the introduction of the matter might call forth political squibs or opposition and the cry of an endeavor to restrain the liberty of the patriotic citizen, but as the verified statistics show that of the earned wealth of the country since 1870 seven hundred millions have been destroyed by fire, we do not know of a question more important than this and it should not be "whistled down the wind."

The necessity of preventing so enormous a destruction of earned values is so apparent that it admits of no question. Possibly this great loss has much to do with the present mercantile troubles which so seriously affect the community, and it must impoverish the nation unless it is checked.

You will, no doubt, remember that the conflagration which so nearly destroyed Portland, July 4, 1866, originated from the careless use of fire-works, and there is reason to apprehend that other cities will suffer by the approaching celebration, unless some national effort to restrain carelessness and provide against such emergencies can be inaugurated. We bring the subject to your attention, hoping that some method may suggest itself to you by which the interests of the whole country will be enlisted to prevent fires from these sources.

It occurs to us that possibly the Secretary of State might consider it worthy of a short proclamation by the President. We leave the matter in your hands for such action as may suggest itself to you; and if some such notice can be secured you would render the country a public service. The date is so near that any action taken should be prompt

Yours, most respectfully,

B. C. TOWNSEND,
Secretary, A. D.

Hon. S. B. CHITTENDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. FORT. I suggest that that communication ought to go to the Committee for the District of Columbia, for that is the only place in the United States over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I accept that suggestion.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

RAILROAD IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. TERRY. I ask unanimous consent to call up and have passed the bill (S. No. 46) granting the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line to the Walla Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company across Fort Walla Walla military reservation, in Washington Territory.

No objection was made.

The bill was read. It provides that the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, through the lands of the Fort Walla Walla military reservation in Washington Territory is thereby granted to the Walla Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of said Territory, for the purpose of constructing a railroad and telegraph line; provided, that the said right of way, and the width and location thereof through said lands, and the regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the reservation so as to prevent all danger to public property shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War prior to any entry on said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works; provided also, that whenever said rights of way shall cease to be used for the purposes aforesaid the same shall revert to the United States.

Section 2 provides that Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

JOHN A. SHAW.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 509) for the relief of John A. Shaw; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC GROUNDS IN CHICAGO.

Mr. HARRISON. On the first day of this month a unanimous report was made from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on a bill (H. R. No. 3631) to confirm to the city of Chicago, Illinois, the title to certain public grounds, and a motion to recommit the bill was made. I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted, and I now call up that motion to reconsider, and propose that the vote be reconsidered and the bill passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to recommit; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I now ask for the passage of the bill.

The bill was read. It provides that all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the public grounds in that portion of the city of Chicago known as "Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago," subdivided, platted, and recorded under the authority of the Secretary of War about the year A. D. 1839, be, and hereby is, conveyed to the city of Chicago, together with all the accretions and riparian rights and all reversions and remainders thereto belonging; provided, however, that this act shall in no respect impair the dedication heretofore made of said grounds, or any private rights therein.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is this the report of any committee?

Mr. HARRISON. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The report was presented on the first day of the month, and unless some gentleman wishes to make inquiries in reference to it I will move the previous question upon it.

Mr. FORT. I desire to say that I am in favor of the bill, but I suggest to my colleague whether this ought not reserve to the United States the right, if necessary, to encroach on any of this land for the purpose of dredging out the harbor?

Mr. HARRISON. It does not touch upon the harbor at all.

Mr. FORT. If my colleague will consider I think he will find that there are accretions which might be conveyed by this bill which would extend so far into the lake as to cross the channel of the Chicago River.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say that it is hardly probable that the city of Chicago would allow anything to be done to destroy its harbor on which its vast commerce depends.

Mr. FORT. Certainly not.

Mr. HARRISON. This bill has been fully considered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to antagonize the bill. I will ask another question: What private right is reserved by this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Any and all private rights, if there are any; we do not regard that there are any private rights in conflict with the bill.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman know of any?

Mr. HARRISON. The only private rights that can possibly be affected by the bill are these: in some places where scrip was issued certain parties have attempted to locate a warrant upon the riparian rights, and no attention has been paid to that by the bill. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NECESSITY FOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States, and desires to call particularly the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the message.

The Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The near approach of a new fiscal year and the failure of Congress up to this time to provide the necessary means to continue all the functions of government, makes it my duty to call your attention to the embarrassments that must ensue if the fiscal year is allowed to close without remedial action on your part.

Article 1, section 9, of the Constitution declares:

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

To insure economy of expenditures and security of the public treasure, Congress has from time to time enacted laws to restrain the use of public moneys except for the specific purpose for which appropriated and within the time for which appropriated, and to prevent contracting debts in anticipation of appropriate appropriations.

Revised Statutes, section 3679, provides:

"No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations."

Section 3732 provides:

"No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made, unless the same is authorized by law or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments, for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year."

Section 3678, as follows:

"All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others."

Section 3690, that—

"All balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills, and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year, shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year, or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year; and balances not needed for such purposes shall be carried to the surplus fund. This section, however, shall not apply to appropriations known as permanent or indefinite appropriations."

The effect of the laws quoted, taken in connection with the constitutional provision referred to, is, as above stated, to prohibit any outlay of public money toward defraying even the current and necessary expenses of Government after the expiration of the year for which appropriated, excepting when those expenses are provided for by some permanent appropriation, and excepting in the War and Navy Departments, under section 3732.

The number of permanent appropriations are very limited, and cover but few of the necessary expenditures of the Government. They are nearly all, if not quite all, embraced in section 3687, 3688, and 3689 of the Revised Statutes. That contained in section 3687 is applicable to expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, that in section 3688 to the payment of interest on the public debt, and that in section 3689 to various objects too numerous to detail here.

It will be observed that while section 3679, quoted above, provides that no Department shall in any one fiscal year involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of the appropriation for that year, section 3732, also quoted above, confers, by clear implication, upon the heads of the War and Navy Departments full authority, even in the absence of any appropriation, to purchase or contract for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation not exceeding the necessities of the current year. The latter provision is special and exceptional in its character, and is to be regarded as excluded from the operation of the former more general one. But if any of the appropriation bills above enumerated should fail to be matured before the expiration of the current fiscal year, the Government would be greatly embarrassed for want of the necessary funds to carry on the service. Precluded from expending money not appropriated, the Departments would have to suspend the service, so far as the appropriations for it should have failed to be made.

A careful examination of this subject will demonstrate the embarrassed condition all branches of the Government will be in—and especially the executive—if there should be a failure to pass the necessary appropriation bills before the 1st of July, or otherwise provide.

I commend this subject most earnestly to your consideration, and urge that some measure be speedily adopted to avert the evils which would result from non-action by Congress. I will venture the suggestion, by way of remedy, that a joint resolution, properly guarded, might be passed through the two Houses of Congress, extending the provisions of all appropriations for the present fiscal year to the next in all cases where there is a failure on the 1st of July to supply such appropriation; each appropriation so extended to hold good until Congress shall have passed a corresponding appropriation applicable to the new fiscal year, when all moneys expended under laws enacted for this fiscal year shall be deducted from the corresponding appropriation for the next.

To make my ideas on this subject more clear, I have caused to be drawn up a "joint resolution" embodying them more fully.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 17, 1876.

Mr. PAGE. Let the accompanying joint resolution be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the accompanying joint resolution as a part of the message.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution to provide for defraying temporarily the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service.

Whereas the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service in the various branches, comprising among others the expenses which especially pertain to the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government, to the consular and diplomatic service, to the postal service, to the support of the Army and to the maintenance of the Navy, are generally met by annual appropriations which expire at the end of the current fiscal year; and whereas no public funds will be available to defray these expenses as the same shall accrue after that period unless appropriations shall have been previously made therefor by law; and whereas to avoid the great embarrassment of the public service that might otherwise ensue it is expedient to make provision for defraying temporarily such of these expenses as would be unprovided for in case some one of the usual annual appropriation bills designed to provide therefor should fail to be matured by the end of the fiscal year now current: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case any of the following appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, shall not have passed by the commencement of such year, so that the funds to be appropriated thereby may then be available for expenditure, that is to say, the bill providing for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; the bill providing for the consular and diplomatic expenses; the bill providing for the service of the Post-Office Department; the bill providing for the support of the Army; and the bill providing for the naval service, the appropriation act for the current fiscal year corresponding in its general description and object to such appropriation bill shall extend to the fiscal year next ensuing until such appropriation bill is enacted and takes effect, to the end that the provisions of such appropriation act which apply to the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service for the current fiscal year shall in like manner be applicable to similar expenses which may accrue during the period intervening between the end of the current fiscal year and the time when such appropriation bill for the next ensuing fiscal year shall be enacted and take effect.

Mr. RANDALL. While that message is rather unusual, and as I think altogether unnecessary, still it should have a respectful reference and consideration. The Committee on Appropriations and this House are not unmindful at all of the situation; and they have brought, both the committee and the House, elaborate consideration and great industry to the subject of the appropriations for the next fiscal year. They have reached a result enormously reducing the public expenditures of the Government. They believe they have not reduced them in any particular below what the Government can be administered for. Believing that, so far as I know the Committee on Appropriations will recommend to this House an adherence in the main to their recommendations.

In the abundance of caution, however, it may be well that the country should understand that if we have erred in any particular so as that friction may be produced in the administration of the Government, we shall be here, or rather some of us, in December next, when we will be enabled to remedy any such error that we may have committed.

The people of this country from one end to the other desire economy, reduction, and retrenchment of expenditure. It is safe ground for any of the representatives of the people to stand upon. From that proper reduction there is no occasion to move, nor is there any occasion for any flutter. We say that the amount of these appropriation bills are fully adequate to a proper administration of the Government. We say more, that in the present condition of the varied industries of the people, which are now prostrate, and more particularly and directly in connection with the amount of money coming into the Treasury, these reductions not only are advisable but are indispensable. Upon that issue we propose to stand and to go before the country, so far at least as I can advise.

I move that the message of the President, with the accompanying proposed joint resolution, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman include in his motion a motion to print?

Mr. RANDALL. That is usual on a reference. Of course the message, having been read, will go into the RECORD.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have no objection, of course, to the reference proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL;] but he need not suppose that, either before this House or before the country, he, his committee, or those who support him are to avoid the direct and impending responsibility of their action.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman ask me a question?

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir; I did not ask any question. I was making a statement, which is a different thing.

The fact remains that here in this seventh month of the session the present Committee on Appropriations have not yet reported to this House all the appropriation bills. The fact remains that with the fiscal year closing rapidly upon us, no agreement has been reached or is likely to be reached between the two legislative bodies as to those bills which have passed this House. The fact remains that by the action of this House in insisting upon extravagant and unnecessary reductions; in insisting upon the application of an unwise and illegitimate rule, which transferred all power of this House into the hands of the Committee on Appropriations, we are brought face to face with a dead lock against the Senate of the United States, and the Senate have the law on their side.

The attempt which is made here by this House of Representatives is not to give the co-ordinate body the fair opportunity of free discussion, but to compel them, by changes made without warrant of law in an appropriation bill, to either ignore the public service and let these difficulties indicated in the President's message occur, or that they, representing just as much and just as freely the sentiments and opinions of the country as we do, shall be compelled to surrender their own convictions.

Now, sir, what is the outlook? That is the thing we must meet practically. Here we are within two weeks of the end of the fiscal year, and no sort of provision whatsoever has yet been perfected to carry on the workings of this Government; and when the clock shall strike at midnight on the 30th of June this Government is left absolutely powerless to carry on any of its ordinary functions; powerless by reason of the incompetency and unnecessary delay of the majority of this body in reporting these appropriation bills; powerless because of the assumption of the majority of this body, in violation of law, to make changes in the whole fabric of our administration in appropriation bills.

The President simply desires—not dictating at all to either branch of Congress—to submit some means by which the ordinary service of the Government may be carried on until this dead lock between the two bodies can be removed. It is right that he should submit it. He would not have done his duty if he had not submitted it; and it is now a question for the Committee on Appropriations, which by the unwise change of the rules of this House has absorbed all the legislative functions of this body—it is a question for them to consider whether or not they dare peril the stoppage of the machinery of this Government on the 1st day of next July. That is for them to determine, not for me.

I state these things not with any idea of provoking any argument upon the subject. I should not have said a word about it but for the vaunting style in which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations thought fit to preface an ordinary motion of respect to a message of the President of the United States.

But, sir, for one I am willing, as I suppose every other gentleman on this floor is, to accept the full responsibility of the position; and I say here that the Senate of the United States is in no way bound to recognize the change which we made in our rules unwisely and improvidently; that they have the right to stand out and insist that this House shall either change existing law by law (and law implies the free consent of both parties who have the power to make the enactment) or that we shall appropriate in accordance with existing laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that from one point of view the presentation of this message to the House is not unfortunate. It will at least admonish gentlemen that the appropriation bill now pending in the Committee of the Whole should be promptly passed. The facts stated in the message and well known to the House indicate the imperative necessity of the policy which has been urged upon the House with some earnestness for some time past, that especial attention shall be devoted and the especial time of the House given to the passage of the appropriation bills. This message is unusual. It has not unfrequently occurred in the history of our legislation within a comparatively recent period that important appropriation bills, in which no effort at reform or retrenchment was attempted, have passed after the 30th day of June, after the close of the current fiscal year. The passage of the leading appropriation bills in the closing hours of the session has been the general experience of Congress for many years. Both Houses of Congress are generally well-informed of the importance of the passage of the appropriation bills before the end of the fiscal year. This House has labored with great earnestness to secure the result this session.

The message is certainly unusual, for Congress could not be unmindful of the importance of promptly passing the general appropriation bills.

But, sir, what is the state of the business so far as the House is concerned? Let us see whether the arraignment of the House by implication in the message which has been read, and directly in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] is entirely just. All the great appropriation bills for the current session have passed the House except two—all except two; and one of these—the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army—should undoubtedly reach the Senate before the adjournment of the House to-day, judging from the present condition of the measure. The other, and the last of the appropriation bills—the sundry civil bill—requiring unusual care and labor in its appropriations—that measure, as gentlemen well know, having of late years grown in the magnitude of its appropriations beyond any possible justification—that bill I think I am safe in saying will be reported to the House as early as Tuesday next; and I indulge the hope that by Wednesday of next week that bill also will have reached the Senate. So that I may say with reasonable confidence all of the appropriation bills will have passed the House before the end of the fiscal year—the last some nine days before the end of the fiscal year—giving ample time, if these measures shall be met in the reasonable spirit of retrenchment that has animated this House, to secure their final passage before the end of the fiscal year.

The large body of facts, the information from the Departments upon which the House has acted, slowly accumulated through many months, relieve the other House of Congress of the embarrassment under which we have labored.

The House passed the bill of especial moment, the post-office appropriation bill, some thirty days ago. Many amendments were made to that bill by the Senate, and it was returned to the House. The House promptly (I think on last Monday) non-concurred in the amendments made by the Senate, and the bill was returned to that body. From that day to this the House has heard nothing of the action of the Senate concerning that bill, in many respects the most important bill of the session.

If I am correct as to the time when that bill passed the House, after this delay on the part of the Senate in acting upon the measure, and especially the delay in acting upon the non-concurrence of the House in the Senate amendments, surely the House cannot be held responsible if that branch of the public service shall suffer; but I trust no injury will result from this delay; there is ample time for the passage of the bill, even if the Senate shall wish a conference on their amendments.

The other bill especially referred to—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—makes appropriations simply for salaries. The diplomatic and consular appropriation bill makes appropriations simply for salaries. Well-paid employés of the Government are alone concerned in those bills; but the post-office appropriation bill is one that reaches far beyond that, and involves the most important and valuable interests—social, commercial, and political—of the whole people. Yet, if my memory is correct, that bill was returned to the Senate last Monday with the non-concurrence of the House in the Senate amendments; and up to this hour the House has not been informed of the wish of the Senate.

In this connection, permit me to say that the House did not ask for a conference on that bill; it was not in accordance with parliamentary law that a conference should have been asked for by the House. The House making the amendments which are non-concurred in is the body to ask for a conference if they desire to insist on their amendments, though this rule is frequently disregarded in the closing hours of a session. Thus it occurs that that important bill, the post-office appropriation bill, with the Senate amendments non-concurred in, has slept in the Senate for some five days, if my memory is correct, without any communication to the House from the Senate touching the measure.

It is true the Senate was not in session a portion of this time, but the House has remained in session.

I say, then, that by the twenty-second day of the present month, according to the present appearances of the public business, every one of the great appropriation bills will have reached the Senate, having passed the ordeal of this House after the most thorough and exhaustive inquiry, leaving then eight entire days of the session in which the bills undisposed of may receive the proper consideration of the two Houses and patient conferences upon those measures of reform and retrenchment proposed by the House in which the Senate may not wish to concur.

Under these circumstances I am not aware that there is anything to create an apprehension upon the part of the Executive that the appropriations required for the proper administration of the Government will not be made in season. I have called the attention of the House to the fact that it is not without precedent in recent years for appropriation bills of the most important character to pass Congress after the expiration of the current fiscal year, even when no special effort at reform was attempted, and it was not found that the public service materially suffered. Indeed, sir, it is within the memory of gentlemen on this floor that the sundry civil bill, which has not yet been reported to this House, and of course has not reached the Senate, is in the main, while appropriating many millions, so unimportant (though it does contain some important and necessary appropriations) that it was defeated or laid upon the Speaker's table during the Thirty-eighth Congress to "sleep the sleep of death" without this Government being in the slightest degree embarrassed in the administration of its powers.

I admit that the sundry civil appropriation bill does contain some provisions which must become law, or else the Government would be quite seriously embarrassed; but the most of its appropriations are of no moment to the Government. But having said this much as to the condition of the public business before Congress, I do not hesitate to say that there is no reason to doubt that, with concurrent effort on the part of the other branch of the national Legislature and a spirit of fairness in view of the public interests and necessities and the just demands of the people for reasonable retrenchment and reform, these bills will have passed through both branches of Congress and become laws within the present fiscal year. For I deem it unjust to assume that this House is more eager to relieve the industries of the country from oppressive taxation than the Senate.

The gentleman from Illinois went beyond the courtesies of debate in the remarks which he thought proper to submit to the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. In what respect?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think he did.

Mr. HURLBUT. Well, in what respect?

Mr. HOLMAN. It was a very cheap method of assault to talk about the incompetency of a committee of this House; a cheap mode of assault.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am not aware that I used that expression.

Mr. HOLMAN. A committee composed not entirely of members of either party, but of members of both parties.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am not aware that I used that word.

Mr. HOLMAN. "Incompetent" was the word, and the gentleman used it with great earnestness. He should bear in mind that the committee which is thus discourteously treated embraced not simply democrats, but distinguished republicans—that great citizen of New York whose name yesterday traveled the wires throughout this broad land as entitled in the judgment of the republican party as represented by its national convention to the second place within the gift of the American people is a distinguished member of that committee. Others entertaining the same political faith that he does, scarcely less distinguished than himself, are members of that committee. And I think, sir, that that committee has displayed a spirit of fairness and singleness of purpose in its efforts for reform, looking only to the public welfare, equal to the patient industry with which its inquiries have been conducted.

This House has never surrendered a power conferred on it by the Constitution, but has again and again asserted its constitutional powers as necessary for the public safety. But the gentleman from Illinois seems to concede, is willing to concede, that even in the method of procedure this House is dependent on the Senate. But I have seen it otherwise even when the gentleman's political friends were in complete power here.

That was when the Senate thought to assume the power of originating money bills, which, in the spirit of the Constitution, was reserved to the House as the nearest and most responsible to the people. I refer to the right of the House of Representatives without concurrence of the Senate to change the rules of its procedure. I think, sir, that the Constitution has provided that each House shall determine its own methods of procedure. I did not suppose a member of this House was prepared to yield the point that even in the rules of procedure the House must ask concurrence of the Senate.

The gentleman says that provisions were placed upon those appropriation bills which have gone to the Senate which the Senate was not bound to regard, not having assented to the change made in the rules of the House. What rules does the gentleman refer to? The old rule authorized the change of existing law in the interest of expenditure—of increased expenditure. It allowed a change of law in the interest of extravagance; but the House reversed that rule. The new rule reversing the old one declared that provisions affecting existing law might be ingrafted on an appropriation bill in the interest of retrenchment. The House had an unquestionable right to adopt it, under the Constitution, without the concurrence of the Senate.

I am willing, sir, that the gentleman should arraign before the country this House for that change of its rule. A rule is all right, according to the gentleman, and one which the Senate is bound to respect, if it allows extravagance of expenditure, appropriation without limit upon the power to take money from the public Treasury; for this purpose any change of law by an appropriation bill was allowable; but if it be that by the law of the House no provision changing existing law shall be in order unless it be in the interest of economy, unless it retrench expenditure, that law of the House, according to the view of the gentleman from Illinois, is a measure which the House has not the right to adopt without the concurrence of the other branch of Congress.

Gentlemen say you shall not legislate on an appropriation bill. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman cannot point to one provision of any one bill which has passed the House this session, up to this time, which has not been the subject of legislation on an appropriation bill time and time again during the last twenty years, and always in the interest of increased expenditure. I defy the gentleman to point to a single legislative provision in any of the appropriation bills which passed this House during this session of Congress that the same feature of legislation on the same subject-matters are not found in appropriation bills which have passed Congress from time to time for twenty years past; but reversed, sir, in their purpose, changing the laws by appropriation bills to increase salaries and every known form of expenditure, while now the inexorable rule only allows the law to be changed by an appropriation bill in the interest of retrenchment. Did gentlemen complain of the old rule? O, no; but they view the new rule with abhorrence. The gentleman denounces legislation on an appropriation bill.

Does he refer to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which retrenches expenditure many million dollars by reducing salaries? Does he not know that for thirty years all the legislation of this country by which salaries have been increased has been on appropriation bills? But now when the rule is reversed, and it is proposed to allow the people through their Representatives to retrench expenditures on appropriation bills, his fiery indignation is roused, and the gentleman talks about an incompetent committee.

Incompetent! No, sir. The rule adopted by the House was a rule in the interest of economy and honest government, as every gentleman upon this floor knows. It has been honestly and earnestly applied to that office. There has been a sincere purpose, not on this side of the House only but on that side of the House, a sincere, earnest purpose upon the part of the larger number of Representatives here, rising above party, to retrench the expenditures of this Government. The iron hand of taxation lies heavily upon the labor of this country. Corruption in Government has followed on the heels of extravagance. Well may the people at their firesides in their cities and towns and villages and at their rural gatherings demand retrenchment and reform at the hands of this Congress. And I thank God, sir, that in the main, through all these months of investigation and discussion, there has been a general effort on both sides of this House to rise above party in the attempt to purify this Government by retrenching its expenditures and extinguishing as far as it can be done by legislation the unblushing venality in public affairs which has of recent years so often tinged the cheek of every honest man in the nation with the sense of public dishonor.

I have felt justifiable in saying this much in vindication of this House. These bills will have reached the Senate in ample time if they should be met by the Senate in the spirit of reform in which they were passed by this House. If it should transpire that the desire to reform abuses, to retrench expenditure, to reduce salaries is confined alone to this House, there may be serious embarrassment; but I know very well that if the Senate is willing to meet the reasonable expectations of the people in reducing expenditures, now that money has grown greatly in value and taxation more oppressive, in the spirit that inspires the greater number on both sides of this House, every appropriation bill will have passed Congress before the 1st day of July, and no embarrassment will ensue; and Congress will receive in this centennial year the unqualified thanks of the country.

I will call attention, sir, in conclusion, to the fact that the bill making appropriations of money out of the public Treasury to pay the pensions of the soldiers, their widows, and their orphan children, has passed both branches of Congress with great unanimity, and is now a law of the land.

Mr. HURLBUT. You did not change any law in that.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill which was asked by the Departments of the Government to enable them to bridge over the present fiscal year, the deficiency bill, was passed promptly. And yet I venture to say if that bill had been met in any spirit of factiousness not one dollar of deficiency would have been appropriated. I have some ground to complain that we are not met in the spirit of magnanimity which we think in the main this side of the House has displayed. When that deficiency bill came in, this side of the House might well have resisted it, as it was demanding an expenditure beyond the appropriations which you made for the present fiscal year during last session of Congress. But without any hesitation we passed that deficiency bill and it promptly became a law.

Does this look like a disposition to embarrass the Government?

I say again, in conclusion, that this House has not put on the appropriation bills, in the interest of economy, and we have none other, one legislative provision, like provisions to which cannot be found time and time again on appropriation bills during the last ten years in the interest of extravagance; and that every one of those legislative provisions is in the interest of economy, and for the avowed purpose of retrenching expenditure, and does in fact reduce the expenditures of this Government. I do not believe, sir, in the present temper of the American people, in the present prostrate condition of their industries, with the present weight of taxation upon them, that either party in either branch of Congress can afford to hesitate in attempting an honest effort at reform. The expenditures of this Government must be reduced, and no evasion or subterfuge will either satisfy or deceive the people. Sincere and honest reform is demanded, and I do not think any party can afford to neglect that demand. We ask a reasonable retrenchment; and all that we ask is to be met in the same spirit as that in which we bring forward our measures. We have applied the rule of retrenchments impartially, indifferent to mere party considerations. For myself, I scorn the thought of being controlled in legislation by any consideration of party. It cannot be charged upon us that we have acted in a spirit of partisanship, for we have applied the rule alike to all the employés of this House, to the employés of the Senate, and to employés in every Department of the Government, and have impartially rejected from the public Treasury those not required by the public service. We demand retrenchment, and for the purpose of carrying that demand into effect we have made such moderate reductions in the appropriations, as in our judgment, after the most careful scrutiny, the public interest seemed to require.

Instead of embarrassing the Government, this retrenchment will give vigor to every branch of the Administration, by promoting its purity and driving out the low and unworthy motives of venality from the public employment.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I had wished to defer saying what the situation seemed to me to invite until the Appropriations Committee should, upon a conference, formally report the situation to this House. I had intended to postpone any remarks upon the subject for the reason that, after a full and free conference with the Senate, I supposed that committee would make a candid statement to the House of the situation, and would consult the House as a whole, independent of party considerations, touching the proper course of action in an emergency like this. What I have to say now, sir, I shall say in the most careful modes of expression, that there may be no unreasonable exhibition of party sentiment or other prejudice in presence of the very serious situation into which this branch of Congress seems to be settling.

The President of the United States has sent to us a message near the close of the fiscal year of 1876 calling our attention to the fact that the public service in all its branches is imperiled after the 1st of July next, from the probable want of laws appropriating money to carry it on. He has suggested to us that if further time for deliberation is required we can allow the balances of former appropriations, in excess of expenditures, to be applied to the services of the next year, so as to enable the Government to go on temporarily under existing laws.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] meets that message—and with some little disrespect it seems to me to the official and constitutional organ of the Executive Government—with an intimation that the President of the United States has done an unnecessary act, and implies that it was a communication which he ought not to have made to the House. On that question I take most respectful and decided issue with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The President, under the Constitution, is sworn to execute the laws, and by the Constitution is required from time to time to make communications touching the welfare of the Government. If the crisis is such as to imperil the very administration of the Government itself, is it not the duty of that high officer of the Constitution to acquaint Congress with it and urge action to meet that emergency? For example, sir, after the 1st of July, or on that very day, if you pass no consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, the Secretary of State will be obliged to telegraph to every consul, every foreign minister, and to every foreign depository of the United States that if a draft is drawn upon the United States after that date that draft will be protested, and the financial credit of the country will, to that extent, be dishonored. Was it not the duty of the President to let us know such facts, and call our attention especially to them? If the Indian appropriation bill fails a formidable difficulty will occur in our relations with the Indians; and in that case it will imperil lives as well as property of the citizens on the frontier.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the Indian bill now before the Senate?

Mr. KASSON. I will speak to what the gentleman has said, in a moment, in regard to the state of forwardness of the appropriation bills; I shall not forget it.

The situation in respect to these and other bills is, then, a serious one, and one which commends itself to the serious consideration of members on both sides of the House. Sir, have we not a country to save and a National Government to protect; or are we but a series of successively triumphant parties, these parties alone to be protected? I affirm that there is no respectable government in the world, whether republican or monarchical, which does not recognize the principle—whichever party succeeds to power—that it is its duty, involving the honor on the one hand and the dishonor on the other of the nation, to sustain the vigorous administration of the government of the country. I ask, therefore, whether we have a Government to be maintained, irrespective of our party predilections; whether there is any member of this House who is unwilling to sustain the honor of his country because his party is not controlling it?

But then gentlemen meet this question by saying that they are willing to sustain the Government by passing appropriation bills, but they will stop sustaining it where they think the Government should stop in its operations. Where, then, is the just ground which we can take and upon which we can stand? You, sir, are an old member of this House, and you have seen, as I have seen, time and again, issues between this House and the Senate, and you know the rule which has been established between the two Houses, a rule older than your service or than mine upon the floor of this House, by which such questions may be settled. We have laws upon the statute-book creating certain offices, establishing an Army and a Navy, making provisions relating to the Indians, &c.; in other words, we have existing laws requiring certain annual expenditures, laws to which the House has agreed and the Senate has agreed and to which the President has agreed, the three co-ordinate branches of the legislative power. Those laws have been made by their free concurrence. What is the position we are asked to take in this House? I make my appeal to no party. I make my appeal to statesmen and to men who wish to do the duty of statesmen.

The position the House now seems to take by its Committee on Appropriations is that, unless the Senate will make a new law, unless the President will approve a new law, this one single third part of the legislative power will refuse to conform to the laws which have already been made and which stand upon the statute-book.

Now, sir, we cannot stand in that position; we cannot refuse to obey existing laws to which all three parts of the legislative power have agreed, without at the same time making ourselves repudiators of the law. There is a rule governing this question, based on the logic of the situation and the outgrowth of congressional experience; and what is it? It is that that House, whether it be the Senate or the House of Representatives, which proposes to change an existing law, after having made every reasonable effort to induce the other House to consent to the change, must in the last resort recede in favor of the law in which both houses and the President have concurred.

And the other rule is that wherever one House proposes a new appropriation, the amount of which is not fixed by law, that House which proposes the largest sum must recede and yield to the House that proposes the smaller sum. On these two rules the two Houses have stood and settled their difficulties and differences in nearly every instance for many years.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] alludes to the sundry civil appropriation bill having once failed. It did fail, but not on such propositions as those which have been appended to our various appropriation bills. I presume I remember the instance to which the gentleman refers, during the war, when Henry Winter Davis, for the sake of a certain protection to personal liberty, if I remember rightly, a provision attached to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and to which the Senate refused to yield, induced this House to let the bill perish at the close of the session. It was not laid upon the table, but it came to us on the report of the committee of conference; and to that report the House would not agree. I see the gentleman rising; does he wish to ask me a question about it?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman remember very distinctly that that bill was laid upon the table? And I think he himself voted to lay it on the table.

Mr. KASSON. No; I made the last remarks upon that bill a few minutes before the close of the session, imploring the House to save at least the light-house and hospital service in that bill. And I will also remind the gentleman that then the law was not as it is now. Now we prohibit the Government from drawing upon the appropriations of a previous year for the like expenses of the succeeding year. At that time we could draw on the unexpended appropriations of the previous year for the same purpose in the succeeding year until the appropriations were exhausted. That was the situation then; but for that I doubt whether this House could have been induced to let that bill fail.

Now, touching the manner in which these appropriation bills have been presented to the House this session. The gentleman from Indiana expresses surprise that the Senate had kept the post-office appropriation bill sent to them on Monday last for five days without notifying the House of its action. Does he consider that an extraordinary delay, knowing, as he does, that for three days the Senate was not in session? Does he regard the Committee on Appropriations as justified in blaming the Senate for delaying action on any of these bills because of the few days they have taken for their consideration—bills which the House has kept back for many months?

What is the situation in this House in respect to these bills? I send Rule 77 to the Clerk to be read. While there are two appropriation bills yet unacted on in the House, and one not yet even reported from the Committee on Appropriations, it will be seen from the rule what was the intention of the House in respect to giving ample time to both the House and the Senate for the consideration of all these bills. If the Clerk will read Rule 77 we will all remember it.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall also be the duty of the Committee on Appropriations, within thirty days after their appointment, at every session of Congress, commencing on the first Monday of December, to report the general appropriation bills for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for consular and diplomatic expenses; for the Army; for the Navy; for the expenses of the Indian Department; for the payment of invalid and other pensions; for the support of the Military Academy; for fortifications; for the service of the Post-Office Department, and for mail transportation by ocean steamers; or, in failure thereof, the reasons of such failure.

Mr. KASSON, [to the Clerk.] That is enough.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me one question.

Mr. KASSON. Let me finish what I have to say on this point. It will be seen from that rule that the delay in the committee's action upon these appropriation bills has been in contravention, not of any supposed or theoretical duty, but of a positive duty as laid down by the rule. I recollect that the committees of this House were not appointed until the 1st of January. That was not the fault of anybody on this floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me a question. Has the gentleman, in all his experience on this floor ever known that rule to be complied with?

Mr. KASSON. Only in part.

Mr. RANDALL. Not during a long session.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not in any session, long or short.

Mr. KASSON. Yes; several bills were reported last session within thirty days.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the gentleman ever known all the appropriation bills at any session of Congress to be reported in conformity with that rule?

Mr. KASSON. I do not think that all of them have ever been reported within the first thirty days.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course not.

Mr. KASSON. But I do know that Committees on Appropriations have met prior to the first Monday of December, and several of the appropriation bills have been reported to the House within the first thirty days of the session. And but for the partisan purpose of combining with the appropriation bills serious changes in the laws for the administration of the Government, we should have had them this session reported to the House long before this time.

The sundry civil appropriation bill, which we have now the promise shall be reported next week, by the 22d of June, is one of those which the rule requires to be reported within thirty days from the commencement of the session or the appointment of the committee. Let me say, in justice to the present Committee on Appropriations as well as of former Committees on Appropriations, that it is nearly impossible to report all the appropriation bills within thirty days. But it is not impossible to get them all in before the 1st day of June; and they should have been before us, the most of them, in March or April, and all of them in the month of May. That would allow very ample time to the committees.

Here comes in the difficulty, that the Committee on Appropriations desire to have power over all the other committees of the House and to subordinate them to that committee. To do that, of course, requires a great deal of time. The committee now expects the Senate, which has its own independent committees, which do not propose to be subordinated to any one committee of this House or of the Senate, to pass upon the appropriation bills and the separate laws thrust into them, as reported from this House, within five or six days from the time when the bills reach them.

I submit that the House has gone too far in this direction, and we must do something to bring the two Houses to an agreement upon some principle of action. Let gentlemen think for a moment what they would say here if the Senate should refuse to pass an appropriation bill unless we would consent to some changes in the law, or in a great variety of laws, which the Senate wanted; and then they will understand somewhat the situation as it is now, when the House demands like action on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to put one other question?

Mr. KASSON. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman speaks about changing laws.

Mr. KASSON. Make it a question, not a speech.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can the gentleman say that any change of law has occurred or been attempted on any appropriation bill that has passed the House at this session that has not occurred time and again in his own experience on appropriation bills?

Mr. KASSON. I answer emphatically that never in my experience did I see an attempt made on an appropriation bill to change the organization of the Navy or the Army. Once I did see a simple transfer of the Indian Bureau to the Military Department.

Mr. RANDALL. Where did Mr. Orth put his bill changing the law in regard to the diplomatic system? And where did Mr. Kellogg put his bill re-organizing the Treasury Department?

Mr. KASSON. The bill of Mr. Kellogg was a mere economical rearrangement of certain officers; and authority for its introduction was given by two-thirds of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. The diplomatic service was changed in 1874 on an appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. It was only done under the old rule by a motion to suspend the rules, adopted by a two-thirds vote, so as to make it in order; and it involved no radical change.

Mr. RANDALL. The minority heretofore in my experience has always been in favor of suspending the rules for anything looking to retrenchment; but this session we found ourselves here with an inadequate number to suspend the rules; and we had to change the rules.

Mr. KASSON. But the number has been adequate heretofore in a republican House. We could always get a two-thirds vote for a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir. But you had a rule then in favor of extravagance, and our rule was a change, so as to be in favor of economy.

Mr. KASSON. Now, sir, one word in regard to the allegation that the former rule was calculated to encourage extravagance. Gentlemen on the other side have implied that the rule referred to prevailed only in republican Congresses. But, sir, that rule was a democratic rule. It was introduced by Mr. C. C. Cambreling, the old democratic chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in old democratic times.

Mr. RANDALL. But the interpretation of that rule was republican.

Mr. HOLMAN. One other question——

Mr. KASSON. I beg not to be interrupted this moment. On the contrary, when Mr. Cambreling saw that he could not increase the pay of custom-house officers in New York, the point being made under the rule, he obtained a report from the Committee on Rules supplying those words, "contingencies for carrying on the Government," under which the democracy of the old "economical" times occasionally increased salaries of officers of the Government. Very little has been done in that way by republican Congresses. As a rule it has been done, if at all, by separate bills or under the old practice of suspending the rules by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman to listen to this inquiry: Does he not know that the pay of postmasters and the compensation of railroads for the transportation of the mails have been fixed on appropriation bills, without a single exception, for the last twenty years?

Mr. KASSON. I do not know that fact. I know that occasionally partial changes of some sort of business like post-office business have been made by motion to suspend the rules to authorize them to be put on appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will be fair about this. Does he not know that the present law, both as to the salaries of postmasters and as to the compensation of railroads for transporting the mails was put on the post-office appropriation bill?

Mr. KASSON. I cannot say as to that. I do not know whether I was in the Congress in which the present law was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was only a few years ago.

Mr. KASSON. I do not believe it was put on an appropriation bill——

Mr. HOLMAN. It was.

Mr. KASSON. Except on a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. It came from the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. There is another point in this case. When we obtained the vote to increase the postal facilities of the Government for the benefit of the people, it was done in an open and manly manner, and with the free consent of the Senate. And never within my knowledge was an appropriation bill allowed to be dropped in this House, with the single exception I have named, by reason of the failure of one House to agree to a new proposition of the other House in respect to a change in the law.

The gentleman says that this post-office appropriation bill is a very important measure. So it is; but he is endeavoring to force the Senate to agree to a proposition to deprive the people of this country of existing postal facilities.

Mr. HOLMAN. That the gentleman knows is not true.

Mr. KASSON. I submit to the gentleman that, in respect to what is known as the fast-mail service in which 15,000,000 people are interested, the gentleman has proposed in the post-office appropriation bill such rates as imperil, if they do not in fact insure, the discontinuance of that service.

Mr. HOLMAN. We proposed in that bill no such thing; and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. KASSON. I must say that I cannot answer for the gentleman's brains, but I will for mine; and that, in my opinion, is the effect of the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is going into the details of a bill, which I did not care to do, because of the importance of the principle involved and the question presented by the President's message; but I felt it due to us on this side of the House to state distinctly the principle of legislation upon which, as I conceive it, we stand; and that is that neither the Senate can by refusing to maintain the Government force this House to change a law at the peril of the Government, nor can the House do it as against the Senate and the President; and that upon these appropriation bills we should comply with the law of the land and vote the bills required by law. Gentlemen cannot fail to see that the claims of the men who have their pay fixed by law are as good as if the appropriation for them were made. It must be made at some time. And when they propose to destroy the diplomatic and consular service if they do not succeed——

Mr. RANDALL. Every man in this House save two voted for that diplomatic bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman voted for it himself.

Mr. KASSON. We did not vote for that part of the bill, but on the contrary opposed it—that part which struck off blindly a large portion of the instruments of our commercial prosperity in the different parts of the world.

Mr. RANDALL. I say on the passage of that bill every man save two voted for it.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman knows he called the yeas and nays for the purpose of making just such a statement as that which he now makes, in order if we voted against it to say that then the republican party as represented here is opposed even to carrying on so much of the Government as the other side chose to leave; and if we voted for it, to claim an approval by us of his whole bill. He knows distinctly we never yielded to the proposition to abolish various places of diplomatic and consular importance throughout the world connected with the commerce of the United States, or with the honor and influence of our nation abroad.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not think upon so slender a provocation that side of the House could be put to flight on the question of economy. I supposed they cast their vote according to their judgment.

Mr. KASSON. With our own reductions of so many millions in the appropriations made by the last and republican Congress, with our agreement to reduction in the last Navy bill, our agreement to reduction in the fortification bill, and our agreement to reduction in every instance where, in our honest judgment, you did not imperil the Administration, the gentleman still talks about our opposition to economy. If economy is to reduce expenditures without reason and against judgment, why have not this committee doubled, trebled, quadrupled their economy? They are not half economists on that principle. They could have cut off half the Government or utterly destroyed it, instead of a quarter of it, and still call it economy.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree, if we had the co-ordinate branch of the Government with us, there could have been a reduction of the expenditures of this Government without any peril under the Administration, but with great relief to the tax-burdened people, of twenty millions more than we have reported.

Mr. KASSON. Instead of economy consistent with the due administration of the Government, we have that sort of economy which re-arranges the order of the Government as the bull arranges the china on the shelves of a china-shop when he is turned loose into it. [Laughter.] Economy is orderly retrenchment, justified by facts given, by facts ascertained, and justified by those most intimately acquainted with the necessities of the Government. In every instance where those reasons existed and those facts were given this side of the House has voted for the reduction. There is not a single Department of this Government which has admitted that they could sacrifice without detriment to the public service even one clerk that this side of the House has not cheerfully voted for the reduction. And so it has been with all the appropriations, where we thought we could dispense with any disbursement for the next fiscal year. It is not fair nor just, therefore, to say there is any opposition to economy on this side of the House. Gentlemen know it is our interest as well as our duty to go to the last point in retrenchment and economy consistent with the success of Government and with our obligations to the people of the country; and we will do it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman this question. He has complained of the delay of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KASSON. That is going back to another matter, and I hope the gentleman will not keep me on the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. But one moment. When the Secretary of War, Judge Taft, came into that office and reduced the estimates of his predecessor, reducing those estimates some $5,000,000, did not the state of things which justified him in making that reduction show it was proper the House of Representatives should be patient in its efforts to reduce appropriations—patient for still further reduction justified by the same circumstances and by the estimates which had been sent in for their appropriation bills?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; for a long time had elapsed since the former estimates had been sent in, and since they had been sent in there had been a change of administration of that Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did it not apply to all the other bills?

Mr. KASSON. It did not apply to all the other bills. There was no other such change in administration. He simply omitted those things which a further lapse of time had shown it was possible to dispense with or postpone. Not content with that, the gentlemen go beyond what that admittedly honest and intelligent officer has said was right and proper, and propose to mount on the Army appropriation bill, which could pass without trouble except for that very fact, provisions going far beyond what the Secretary said could be done—to put on provisions destroying part of the Army, leaving the frontiers unprotected and our permanent forts unguarded, and insisting that we shall not maintain the Army according to law unless we destroy at the same time a fourth or a fifth part of it.

It is that conduct to which we object on this side and to which we shall continue to object.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come back to the main point for which I rose, and that is to say that there is absolute necessity for us to do one thing or the other in order to save the Government of the country from dishonor and discredit, caused by our action or non-action. We must either re-appropriate now what remains of former appropriations, or rather make them applicable by this resolution to the service of the next fiscal year, or else our conference committees must come to some early understanding with the Senate upon that old ground on which we have so often met—upon that established rule which is founded in sound reason, justice, and experience.

Mr. HEREFORD rose.

Mr. ATKINS. Before the gentleman from West Virginia begins I would like that the House should come to some understanding as to how long this debate is to run. If a gentleman on this side is to speak of course some gentleman on that side will reply, and I would like to know when this discussion is to close.

Mr. RANDALL. When the gentleman from West Virginia rose I was about to endeavor to close debate by calling the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. HEREFORD. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I was surprised when the gentleman from Illinois rose in his seat and told this House that he and his party intend to hold us on this side of the House responsible for not passing just such an appropriation bill as they deem proper at the other end of this building. I accept, so far as I am concerned, that responsibility. The people of this country, irrespective of party, in their party platforms have pledged themselves to economy and reform. But what step in the direction of economy and reform have we ever seen taken by the other side of this House? Every single proposition that is made of any magnitude or of any importance whatever toward economy is met and fought step by step by that side of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman from West Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the gentleman address himself to the reductions made in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HEREFORD. I will do so with great pleasure.

Mr. FORT. In that bill was there not appropriated $400,000 in the gentleman's own district to improve a few dry creeks?

Mr. HEREFORD. I will state, by way of parenthesis, that the bill which I had the honor to report for the improvement of rivers and harbors appropriated between $800,000 and $900,000 less than the appropriations of last year. And I will ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] if he did not vote for that same river and harbor bill? I should like an answer from the gentleman. I ask him if he did not vote for the river and harbor bill himself?

Mr. FOSTER rose.

Mr. FORT. I asked the gentleman from West Virginia a question; and I did not vote for the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. One at a time.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia want an answer?

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. I found that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] were not opposing the bill, and I voted for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I voted against it.

Mr. FOSTER. Where was the gentleman's voice at that time?

Mr. HOLMAN. You voted to suspend the rules. I said all that could be said on a motion to suspend the rules. I demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. FOSTER. And where was the gentleman from Pennsylvania at that time? We did not hear his voice.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was here, as he always is. The record shows where he was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. HEREFORD. To answer more fully my friend from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] before taking up the thread of the remarks I was about to make, I will say that the river and harbor bill, which I had the honor to report, and for which the gentleman himself voted, not only was $800,000 less than the appropriations of the preceding session, but it was over $8,000,000 less than was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War; over $8,000,000 less than was asked for by the Administration, as the gentleman will find by turning to the Book of Estimates, on page 126. So much, then, Mr. Speaker, for the river and harbor bill.

Now, with the permission of my friends on the other side of the House, if they will give me their attention for a few minutes, I will try to tell them why it is that the people of the United States are holding the party in power to such strict accountability. It is this: When you turn to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury you find that on the 1st of July, 1866, the public debt of the United States had reached the highest figure, and was then $2,773,236,173. Since that period what has been drawn from the people of the United States? If you turn to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, you will find that since 1866 to the present time you have collected from the people $4,682,000,000, nearly $2,000,000,000 more than the whole debt. No man can deny these facts. Your debt on July 1, 1866, was twenty-seven hundred and odd million dollars. Since that time, as the report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows, you have collected over $4,600,000,000, nearly $2,000,000,000 more than the whole debt; and yet what is your indebtedness to-day as it is shown by the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a single moment?

Mr. HEREFORD. Wait a little.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. HEREFORD. I say it is shown by the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury that we were in debt on the 1st of July, 1875, $2,270,000,000. The people of this country are asking this Congress, they are asking men here of all parties—democrats, republicans, and liberals—what have you done with nearly $5,000,000,000 since 1866? You have only decreased your debt about $450,000,000, and we have paid you nearly $5,000,000,000.

Mr. HURLBUT. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether it is in order for the gentleman from West Virginia to say "you have increased our debt" and "you have done" so and so? I want to know whether he means to exclude that side of the House from any responsibility for the debt; whether he has the right to say "you" and "your."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire the Chair to pass upon a matter of rhetoric? The Chair declines to do so.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is not a matter of rhetoric, but of order.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is the trouble with our friends on the other side. They come here and talk to us about being in favor of union, peace, and harmony and brotherly love, and yet no gentleman on this side of the House can arise and make a few remarks upon any subject that it is not thrown into his teeth that he happens to have been born or to represent a district south of Mason and Dixon's line. Upon any and upon all occasions that must come up. It has been so every session since I have been here; and whenever we talk on this side of the House about retrenchment and reform the "bloody shirt" is an answer to us. If we talk about peculations and frauds in high places or in low places, the answer is the "bloody shirt." Thank God, I believe that the people of this country are about to rise in the might and majesty of their power and say to those who breathe such a spirit, "We desire your presence in the national councils no longer." I believe the great mass of the American people are in favor of this.

But let me come back for a moment to the matter I was discussing when interrupted. The people of this country are asking the question what has been done with those thousands and thousands of millions of dollars. That is what these investigating committees have intended to bring to light which have been appointed; but when we attempt to answer this question to the people where those thousands of millions of dollars have gone, through our investigating committees, you call us the ex-confederate House of Representatives and say that our committees of investigation are intended to strike down some loyal man or "assassinate character." That is the answer to all of them, but the people think differently. They are coming back all the time to the question what has become of the $5,000,000,000 which have been drawn from the people during the last ten years. Gentlemen on the other side, when the question of economy comes up, say that they are in favor of economy, but they oppose any steps in that direction, and they come to-day in the person of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] and make a threat to this House that if we do not continue these appropriations upon the same magnificent and extravagant scale they have been doing while they have been squandering $5,000,000,000 they will hold us responsible to the people. As far as I am concerned, I accept the responsibility, and I shall go before the country with my feeble ability and oppose all men and all parties who will not vote for retrenchment and reform and who will not give the widest scope to inform the people through investigating committees and otherwise what has become of the $5,000,000,000 wrung from the hard earnings of the people during the short period of ten years.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should regret exceedingly that Congress should fail to pass the necessary appropriation bills before the expiration of the fiscal year. I should regret very much any embarrassment that the Government should feel in consequence of any differences that might possibly exist between the two Houses on questions of money. I am quite sure, sir, that, in common with a very large majority of the members of this House, I am resolved to do everything I can do consistent with the sense of duty and the oath of office which I took at the beginning of this Congress, to make the appropriations that may be required for the proper conduct of the Government for the ensuing year.

But when I say this, Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to express my regret that the President has seen proper to send us this communication. I think, sir, he has been very, very badly advised, and I think that the responsibility which he ostensibly from his position necessarily must assume for sending us that communication should be properly placed upon other shoulders.

In the first place, there was no necessity for this communication. In the second place, the message itself does not contain one single new idea; and in the third place, I recollect no instance which establishes a precedent for a communication of this kind sent to Congress under circumstances such as now exist. The President tells us, and calls attention to the fact, that it is the House that is to be instructed upon this subject. The President tells us the appropriations will expire on the 30th of the present month. We knew that. He refers us to the law upon the subject, and that no money can be drawn from the public Treasury except in pursuance of law in pursuance of appropriations made beforehand. We knew that. He tells us in addition that after the 30th of this month the Treasurer will not have power to respond to any obligation that exist against the Government. We knew that, sir.

I therefore repeat that so far as reference to law is concerned we knew all that before. But he goes further; he proposes to Congress a measure, a precedent for which does not exist in the annals of the Government, a proposition that the Government may spend what money it requires whether Congress makes any appropriation or not. He sends us the form of a joint resolution which provides that the Government may go on under existing laws, which expire by limitation at the end of the fiscal year, and spend as much money as is now provided for the coming fiscal year until Congress shall act in the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like in good faith to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Very well.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman state what course the Administration could take on the 1st of July in case these appropriation bills are not passed before that time?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will answer the gentleman. I suppose the Administration, under those circumstances, would do precisely what my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] or myself would do; if we had not the money of our own properly to be used for any specific and legitimate purpose, we could not expend it. If the money is not appropriated, I agree with the President and my friend from Ohio that it cannot be expended, for to do so without authority of law would be a violation of the duty of the President. There is no question of that fact.

But I do not apprehend any such result. I cannot comprehend that the President himself, when he put his name to that document for the reasons therein stated, could have assumed for one moment that the two Houses of Congress would finally conclude to differ on the question of appropriations. I apprehend it was for another motive, for another purpose, that that message was sent to us. It was to coerce one branch of Congress into yielding to a demand upon the part of the Executive and his political partisans and coadjutors in the other branch of Congress to grant them what they wanted. This House is to-day placed in the attitude of being surrounded by menace and the power of the Executive and the other branch of the legislative department of the Government to compel us to yield to demands to which in our conscience we do not feel at liberty to yield.

Shall it be assumed that this House in the discharge of its legitimate constitutional right to initiate all appropriations of the public money does not know the amount to be appropriated? While I do not assume that we have original and absolute control, still as a portion of the law-making power of the country we have the right to judge.

Mr. KASSON. Will my friend yield——

Mr. WOOD, of New York. As I said the other day, while under our system of government the legislative branch is modeled upon that of England, the House of Commons in England is never interfered with either by the Crown or by the House of Lords in reference to any money bill it may initiate or pass; but the appropriation made by the House of Commons is final. They tell the government how much money is necessary to be expended, they make the appropriation of that amount of money, and that appropriation is never interfered with.

Mr. KASSON. Now, will my friend yield——

Mr. WOOD, of New York. In a moment. While I do not hold that this House should take that independent position, while I know that under the practice of our Government the assent of the Senate is necessary to all our money bills, and the assent of the President is also necessary unless we pass them over his veto; yet I deny the right of the President of the United States, or of the Senate of the United States, or of any other power in this land, to take from this House its right to originate those bills, its right to consider them, its right to refuse or to assent to any amendment made by the Senate, its independent right, without intimidation or coercion, or influence of an executive or any other character, to judge for itself what it is right and proper to do.

This House is responsible to the people, and is the only branch of the Government of the United States that does represent the people, coming as it does directly from the people. The Senate does not directly represent the people of the United States. The President of the United States once in four years is the creature and the creation of the people. The members of this House, coming from the people every two years and returning to them every two years for its judgment upon their conduct, while they are members of this House are directly responsible to the people.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask my honorable friend to read the clause of the Constitution which gives to this House the exclusive right to originate appropriation bills. And I would also ask him if he does not remember that even revenue bills may be amended by the Senate? The gentleman alluded to the practice in England; that is wholly different from the practice in this country.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have not denied the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. But the gentleman said that this House had the exclusive right conferred on them by the Constitution——

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I say that this House has the right to originate the bills for the appropriation of public money.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman read that clause?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The clause refers directly to revenue bills.

Mr. KASSON. Revenue bills are not appropriation bills.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have seen that clause of the Constitution so construed as to apply to money bills of every character, because they pertain to the revenue. Therefore the gentleman is not strictly accurate in his strained construction of even my hasty declaration of what our constitutional rights are.

Why is it assumed that there is to be a dead lock between the two Houses? Who assumes it? Are we to construe this assumption as the result of a determination on the part of the other branch of Congress to refuse its assent to our bills? Is it the intention upon their part to produce a dead lock if we do not consent to their modification of our bills? Do they propose to bring the executive power to bear upon us, and to say in advance that they will place as before the people of this country in such a position that the creditors of the Government will hold us as a party responsible for the exercise of what we consider our legitimate and proper function? Is that the object? Is the presidential canvass to be opened in advance in this way? History furnishes very many instances of precedents to confirm my suspicion of what is the intention in this case.

Responsibility! Why, sir, we will take that; we will always take the responsibility of our public acts when they commend themselves to our conscience. The people of this country are compelled in their individual affairs to retrench; and they do not understand why we should keep up an expensive, extravagant organization of the Federal Government while they themselves are so dependent, so impoverished, and so destitute. If our friends on the other side threaten to go before the people upon the naked issue whether this House should continue this paraphernalia of Government, established upon such a splendid and extravagant basis, or retrench as proposed by the House of Representatives, we will go there; and if we are to understand that the presidential election is to determine whether the party in power shall maintain its exorbitant scale of disbursement, whether it shall keep up this immense horde of paid followers, whether it shall have its emissaries and agents, paid out of the public Treasury, in every precinct and almost in every man's house—if that, sir, is to be the ground on which we are to go before the country in the coming presidential canvass, I have no donbt of the result. The American people are not in a mood at this moment to continue that which is subversive of their liberties and rights as well as absolutely destructive of their material interests.

I hope that the usual course between the two Houses in attempting to adjust their disagreements as to these bills may continue. I hope there will be no strong, resolute, determined effort upon the part of either House to adhere to anything which in itself cannot be defended solely upon the ground of the public good. As one member of this House, I desire no partisan or political advantage in this matter. I desire to vote the moneys necessary to the support of the Government. I do not want to embarrass the Administration. I want the machine to run on in its integrity, but on a basis that shall come down to the actual condition of the American people. For that I shall struggle and contend to the last.

Mr. KELLEY. My friend from New York [Mr. WOOD] says that he thinks the President has been badly advised, and that such advice has influenced him to make the communication he has made to us this morning. Sir, I do not think any man is ever badly advised by going to the Constitution of the United States for counsel; and I find in section 3 of article 2 of the Constitution a provision defining the duties of the President, which says:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

This is the 17th of June; to-morrow is Sunday. Beyond that there are eleven working days of the fiscal year; and under a recent law prohibiting the expenditure after the expiration of the year of unexpended balances, the Executive will be without one cent of money which it may apply to the support of the Government. But eleven days of the fiscal year remaining and three appropriation bills not yet agreed upon by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. May I remind my friend from Pennsylvania—I think he was here at the time—that appropriation bills have been passed in this House without even being read at the Clerk's desk? One bill appropriating millions of dollars was passed through the House in five minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I will remark that the majority of that Congress was not an opposition majority and had not sought to force a dead lock between it and the majority at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. RANDALL. Does my colleague know how much time it took to pass the sundry civil bill at the last session? It embraced appropriations to the amount of $27,000,000, but it was passed in about two minutes and a half on the morning of our departure. We were debarred from suggesting any reductions or anything else, and there was not one man in ten in this House who knew what was in that bill. As one member of the conference committee I refused to sign the report.

Mr. FOSTER. Neither do members know what is in these bills.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; every appropiation bill this session save one has been discussed.

Mr. FOSTER. Not one man in ten understands what is in them.

Mr. RANDALL. And there is not an item in any appropriation bill that has come from the Committee on Appropriations at this session that has not been duly considered by that committee.

Mr. KELLEY. I am not considering the dead past or how the reports of committees of conference have been disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. I am looking to some of the wounded.

Mr. KELLEY. I am looking to the living future. What are to be the provisions of the appropriation bills that are yet to be agreed upon and reported by the committee? When are they to be reported to and considered by the House? Are they to be passed under the previous question in accordance with intimations just given by the gentleman's significant allusions to the past, and then sent to the Senate and thence to the Executive? No, sir. The message is not indecorous or inopportune. The President sees what every good citizen sees—that if action such as he suggests be not had the Government will be paralyzed twelve days hence.

Mr. RANDALL. Just as the people's industries are now.

Mr. KELLEY. Its custom-houses will be closed; its postal arrangements suspended; its commercial credit dishonored by any draft arriving after the 30th of this month for payment from any one of our consular and diplomatic representatives. If ever an exigency called upon the President to bring "the state of the Union" to the attention of Congress and to submit a measure to its consideration, the impending exigency does.

What does the President suggest? Does he, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] intimates, originate or attempt to originate a bill? Does he trench upon the prerogatives of the House? No. He sees the possibilities of the future; he sees the grounds and breadth of the controversy between the two Houses; and he asks that a law recently repealed, which had existed, I think, for the whole life of the Government, allowing the application of unexpended balances to the uses of the Government shall be revived in order that the two Houses may have time to deliberate and agree upon appropriations for the coming year. He takes no part with either House. He has no intimation to make as to the wisdom or otherwise of any pending bill or of those yet to be reported in this seventh month of the session by the Committee on Appropriations. But in substance he says: "While you are in conflict let the functions of the Government be exercised to the extent that they can be upon unexpended balances of appropriations for this year."

If any man be ingenious or fastidious enough to find a purpose to trespass or trench upon the prerogatives of this House in this suggestion, his ability in that way is keener than mine.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. My friend from Pennsylvania cannot have forgotten that the President sends us a form of law by which we shall agree to intrust to the heads of the Departments of the Government the expenditure of any amount of money they may please. There is now upon the Clerk's desk a form of law draughted in the Executive Mansion, to be passed by Congress, in the shape of a joint resolution.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; in order to show by what a simple process the impending danger may be averted, the project which my colleague has proposed, and properly, to refer to one of the committees of the House, is submitted by the President in the form of a joint resolution. He says the "better to express my meaning I embody it in the form of a joint resolution." Where is the indignity upon the House? Wherein does that trench upon the prerogatives of the House? Wherein is it improper? I fail to see anything improper here.

The gentleman denies the right of the President to originate a bill. He denies the right of the Senate to originate a bill. He deplores the fact that we are not English, while I thank God that we are American. He deplores the fact that the functions of the Government in this particular are not vested in the majority of this House alone, while I rejoice in the fact that the Senate may, by express provision of the Constitution, amend and alter the action of this House. In the event of disagreement between the Houses conferences may be had. So that the best sense of either or both may be applied to our legislation. A bill cannot become a law until both Houses have had separate discussion and action upon its provisions.

I believe that in a multitude of counselors there is wisdom and safety, and that this truth is again illustrated by the danger the President seeks to avert; for, sir, this session of this body will show the country the danger of a single-House Legislature. Let us look at our own experience. It has shown the wisdom of the reference of all questions to committees. As the country has grown and the number of Representatives has increased, the number of standing committees has been enlarged. When I came here the duties now performed by the Ways and Means, the Appropriations, and Banking and Currency Committees were performed by one committee, known as the Committee of Ways and Means. It was found wise to divide the functions and submit them to three committees, to thirty-three gentlemen instead of to nine, by increasing the number of members of each as well as of committees. Yet, sir, one of the first acts of the majority of this House was to consolidate the business of the House within the jurisdiction of a single committee; to divest every committee whose business required or should require an appropriation of its power, and to vest it in the Committee on Appropriations. Thus having concentrated the labors, duties, and power in one committee, great blunders have been made.

Mr. RANDALL. Name them; let us hear what they are.

Mr. KELLEY. Why, the attempt to change the function of the several Departments of the Government?

Mr. RANDALL. That is a very light blunder—a very tender mode of expressing it.

Mr. KELLEY. The transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department was a matter well worth consideration; it was a subject which might well have had the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs and of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. It had both.

Mr. KELLEY. It should have been amply discussed in this House, as it would have been if reported by the appropriate committee.

Mr. RANDALL. It had both. The Indian Committee recommended the transfer after the Committee on Military Affairs had acted on it. We followed the line of their suggestions except as to reduction. Now go on with your blunders, and I will explain them one after another as fast as you state them.

Mr. KELLEY. I will not enumerate them.

Mr. RANDALL. You cannot.

Mr. KELLEY. I leave them to the sense of the country.

Mr. RANDALL. You ought to be informed, and therefore you ought to state them.

Mr. KELLEY. What is that you say?

Mr. RANDALL. You ought to be informed.

Mr. KELLEY. I am.

Mr. RANDALL. You do not state the blunders. You have made a declaration you cannot sustain.

Mr. KELLEY. I propose to discuss the question at issue as it strikes my mind.

Mr. RANDALL. Give the House a little detail of your mind.

Mr. KELLEY. I apprehend that the country will brand them all as blunders, or something worse, and I assert unhesitatingly that the whole legislation thus attempted to be interpolated into appropriation bills was to force a dead lock between the two Houses on those bills. Why is it that within eleven or twelve days of the end of the fiscal year bills are still withheld by that committee? Why is the House and the Senate and the Executive and the country not to know what in the last days will come forth from that committee? Contemplating the facts just alluded to, with the fact that almost every appropriation bill is loaded with legislation, under the rule I have referred to and which I have the right to refer to——

Mr. RANDALL. It is all in the direction of economy.

Mr. KELLEY. I have the right to say the country will believe, as I believe——

Mr. RANDALL. Not in extravagance.

Mr. KELLEY. I have the right to say the country will believe, as I believe, that the object has been, not economy—not economy, sir, but a dead lock.

Economy! Was not the fractional currency good enough? Why issue gold-bearing bonds to buy a new form of fractional currency, if economy were an object?

Mr. RANDALL. Not any dead lock about that.

Mr. KELLEY. Why sell bonds bearing interest in gold, and buy material to make fractional currency? Forty millions of dollars of gold at 5 per cent., and in twenty years you will have paid $40,000,000 interest and still owe the $40,000,000 bonds, with much less than $40,000,000 to show for the $80,000,000. You had a fractional currency which when the holder lost a piece he lost it, and the Government gained its denominational value; but when the holder loses a silver coin which you have bought with gold, he loses it and the Government loses its intrinsic value. In the face of such wanton extravagance it is idle to talk of retrenchment and economy.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not that executing the law of the 14th of January, 1875?

Mr. KELLEY. Exactly; and executing it by men who profess economy, and who have had seven months in which they could have repealed the law—and yet they have not reported a bill to repeal it, although the rules were suspended for that very purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. They will have a dead lock.

Mr. KELLEY. The rules have been altered to allow it to be done, to allow the committee to have leave to report at any time. And when that was being done I said it would be followed by a hellish brood of bills. I was mistaken. It has been anticipated by them. You have passed two silver bills but have not brought forward a bill to repeal the resumption act and prevent the issue of 5 per cent. gold bonds for the purchase of silver.

Mr. RANDALL. We did what you failed in your republican Congress to do, to provide some means of taking a step toward resumption.

Mr. KELLEY. You economize a few tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars at the risk of embarrassing the Government, and you are lavish in your expenditure of millions of gold when it answers the purposes of owners of bonanza mines or dealers in gold and gold-bearing bonds. If you can reach resumption by increasing your gold debt you have taken a step toward resumption—but I cannot see it that way.

But I have been led into a diversion by this hackneyed but illusory cry of economy and retrenchment. I rose simply to vindicate the President from the aspersions which had been cast upon him, and to thank him in the name of the people——

Mr. RANDALL. Fall down and worship.

Mr. KELLEY. For having performed his constitutional duties in calling the attention of Congress to its duty when the faith and credit of the Government are in peril, and the Government itself is fractiously threatened with paralysis.

Mr. BLACKBURN was at this point called to the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. COX. I would not take up the time of the House now except for certain imputations which have been thrown on the famous retrenchment rule, 120. This rule I had the honor to introduce from the Committee on Rules. It is my pleasure to defend it. Besides, I speak because of remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in relation to the Committee on Banking and Currency and the silver bills.

BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE DEFENDED.

As to the last matter, let me say that the House will recollect that at the beginning of this session there was a discussion as to which committee should take charge of the currency business. It was contended by gentlemen on one side that the Committee of Ways and Means was the only proper committee, because the greenback was currency, and because, being a debt also, it had charge of it by virtue of raising ways and means to support the Government. It was argued that to it belonged the exclusive jurisdiction on that subject. It was contended, on the other hand, that the Committee on Banking and Currency should take control. As the author of the measure dividing the old Ways and Means into three committees, I was compelled to speak. My remarks were to the effect that it would be well if all the wise men of both committees and in Congress should give their best attention and judgment to the solution of our most difficult and perilous problem. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania took great care in that debate to assume for his Committee of Ways and Means that it was the only committee which should have the power to consider and report such measures. Now, sir, when he complains of the committee of which I am chairman, may I ask if any report has ever come from the Committee of Ways and Means? Currency bills have been referred to it as to my committee. We have reported something to remonetize silver. Has his committee reported anything?

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to state my position?

Mr. COX. I prefer not to yield now.

Mr. KELLEY. Let me say that I held that the Committee of Ways and Means had the right over the money and bonds, and that the currency or bank paper belonged to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. COX. It is enough to say that we have had no report on money or greenbacks or any kind of currency from the Committee of Ways and Means. But why should I blame it on account of this? No committee of this House, no party in this House, has been ready thus far to make a satisfactory report. Nor has the recent convention of the republican people at Cincinnati given any definite conclusion on that matter. All conclusions have been general and inconclusive. There are no remedies proposed. Why, sir, in Cincinnati the other day, was it an uncertain or a certain sound as to the repeal of this resumption law? I say to the House what I said the other day, that the Committee on Banking and Currency will take that matter up for consideration as soon as a quorum appears. We have no desire to postpone it now that a privilege is afforded us to report at any time. A quorum will be here on Monday. All intimations of disinclination to consider and report on that critical question will be easily repelled by the frankness and future action of that committee which has been peculiarly honored by the House.

THE GREAT RULE OF RETRENCHMENT—120.

But the matter now before the House is brought here by the message of the President. It is significant of conflict, and calls for pluck, faith, virtue, and popular defiance. The debate from one side is an attack on Rule 120 as amended. The object of the amendment of that rule, as gentlemen know very well, was to allow the Committee on Appropriations to retrench and reduce expenditures and salaries. The object of the old rule, I do not care by whom enacted, was to allow them only to increase.

"It has been decided," says Barclay, (page 16,) "that under Rule 120 it is not in order to propose an amendment to a general appropriation bill which changes existing law." But on the same page it is said that it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose.

Increase only! Not decrease at all. No wonder this new Congress, fresh from an impoverished and indignant people, desired more virtue in our rules as well as rulers. What virtue comes from the new rule, which strikes out increasing and inserts its opposite, is due to the honest gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] or the Committee on Rules, who reported that peculiar amendment which he sent to us. It is due as well to the House which has so gallantly sustained the Appropriation Committee in giving effect to the amended rule. From this fountain of pure legislation will come what relief a frugal people will receive from the exactions of profligate legislatures and a more profligate administration.

The amendment from the Committee on Rules was intended to remove our disability to economize. It passed with some disgruntling remarks from gentlemen opposite. It has had several ordeals, but it has come out thus far burnished and purified. Its results are seen in the various reductions which I will hereafter refer to.

HOW THE SENATE RECEIVED THE RETRENCHING RULE.

It may be proper to say that the Senate received it in no pleasant mood; and their action upon the bills passed under its auspices shows plainly that the reform it would work is not acceptable to that body. They fear it will encroach upon their prerogative, or that it will repeal bad laws. However, I venture to say that there was no other mode left to kill the parasite alike with the monster which had been so long eating up the substance of the people by ordinate salaries and scandalous outlays. Besides, it was framed in the very spirit of the best parliamentary law. If it be an innovation, it is a wise one, for what does it not save through the agency of fresh and just legislation?

ENGLISH ANALOGIES AS TO RULE 120.

An authoritative writer, Mr. May, speaking of the English system, reminds us that the House can entertain any motion for diminishing a tax or charge upon the people; and bills are frequently brought in for that purpose without the formality of a committee. All rules are opposed to the imposition of burdens, but not to their removal or alleviation. This is a principle laid down by Cushing, § 2039. Instances of the value of this principle may be given pertinent to our newly-amended Rule 120, as when blanks are left for salaries, rates, &c. These are filled up in committee, but on the report the House may reduce their amount. To increase requires recommittal. So, too, deductions from custom duties may be entertained by the House, but payments out of the revenue must be considered in committee. If, therefore, the Senate objects to the reductions of our appropriations, we plant ourselves upon this priceless principle, lying at the root of parliamentary law and frugal legislation, namely, to guard closely and make facile the blessed privilege of retrenchment; consider long, heedfully, carefully, and jealously the dangerous privilege of increasing burdens. Whereas, as I have shown, under our rule of many years' standing, only amendments on appropriation bills were allowed so as to increase, the new order plainly recognizes the sacred, traditional, rational, and invaluable popular right of curtailing expenditures! To this branch of Congress belongs the credit of building this smooth and broad highway to reform. Without it all platforms and platitudes, all promises and pretentions to economy are as ashes!

MENACE FROM EXECUTIVE AND SENATE.

Yet we are confronted at the closing of this Congress with the menacing challenge of the Senate. We have sent to them our bills, framed in the spirit of economy. The consular and diplomatic bill was passed here after much difficulty and contention, but it passed almost unanimously. The Senate at once disagrees with the House. The legislative, judicial, and executive bill, which had forty days and forty nights of a deluge of debate, passed almost unanimously. The Senate assumes and presumes at once to usurp our function. By a thousand amendments it would make it not only a new bill substantially, but would thereby resuscitate the old bills, as to which the popular reprobation is fresh and uncompromising. Our other bills are to share the same treatment. Let us meet this contest à l'outrance. Let us be patient. The people are behind us. Let the House stand upon the ancient ways. Let us re-assert its undoubted privilege. No prerogative of power, no assumption of equality in this matter, is to be tolerated. No pretentious dignity or increasing usurpation of power on the part of the Senate will excuse the representatives of the people from the courageous performance of their duty. If these bills fail and the very organism of government itself stops, as is threatened by the menacing message read to-day, for want of the motive power, the corrective will be applied by the popular mandate, from which there is no appeal, and before which the Senate is impotent.

There is, therefore, in this dilemma no other course for us but resistance to encroachment. If the Senate will copy the example of the House of Lords in some of its attempts to encroach on the Commons, let them at once make it a standing order to "reject at sight" all of our appropriation bills. Much better and braver would be this contemptuous treatment than the pretense of considering our bills in detail only to reject them en bloc.

JEALOUSY OF THE SENATE.

It is in the beauty of proportion and its compensations of power that our Government finds its best eulogy. Let one branch encroach upon another, and it will become as Mr. Madison once said of Greece: she was undone as soon as the King of Macedon obtained a seat among the Amphictyons. It was not alone the monarchical form of the new confederate, but the disproportionate and disturbing force.

Give to the Senate a power over appropriations ungranted and pernicious, and you not only give it a force in our Federal economy disproportioned and jarring to the general harmony, but you place upon the House itself a responsibility disproportioned to its power. I would not place too much confidence in the Senate. It may be as fatal as too much jealousy of the people. If a Senate which comes within one vote of impeaching Andrew Johnson, to aggrandize its own power, could thus arrogate more than it should, are we not wise to be jealous of its power when it would breed confusion and discontent by tampering with or denying great reforms made by the popular decree and by the popular branch?

TAXATION THE GREAT ISSUE IN ADMINISTRATION.

History teaches that in all contests for power between the governed and the government and between different departments of the government, the question of taxation is not only the most sensitive, but the most potential for good or ill. From the early exactions of the oriental despots and their satrapies down to the largesses of the last Turkish Sultan, which worked his dethronement and suicide; from the embattled protests written in Gaelic blood in the time of the Roman Cæsars, down to the wild sanguinary scenes of the French revolution; from the early protests of the "gentlemen of England" in her Commons against the exactions of the Plantagenets and Stuarts to the last allowance for the children of Queen Victoria; from the times of Hampden and ship-money and Samuel Adams and tea-tribute, which cements by a principle England with her colonies, and both with Magna Charta and the declarations and bills of right. down to the present dissolute extravagance and corruption of the Federal officials in this Capitol and elsewhere, and from the large cities of the seaboard to the remotest border, where the post-trader plies his ill-gotten trade for ill-gotten gain, the perversion of the taxing and appropriating power, which wrests supplies from the people, has been watched with jealousy and attacked with determination.

This Congress will not shame the history of its origin, nor degrade the lofty privileges granted to it by the Constitution. It will not allow them to be abridged or frittered away by making itself the supple slave to an exacting Senate or a grasping Executive. It is, by organic law on this matter, the master.

SENATORIAL ASSUMPTION.

I am not sure that it might, malgré all usage to the contrary, be held that the Senate has no more right to originate or destroy the fundamental propositions or substance of our monetary reform bills than it has to pass bills of attainder, ex post facto or retrospective laws. When it has proposed amendments, and we do not concur, is it not its duty to yield formally to the House? Is not the House the egg or source of the only money bills to be passed? Does merely proposing an amendment give the right to defeat or reject the bill altogether?

A distinguished English parliamentary writer, Mr. Hatsell, rejects as precedents all the proceedings of both Houses from 1641, when Charles I went to the Commons to arrest its members, until the restoration. May we not ask, are not all recent precedents found in the Senate overstepping the express constitutional privilege of the House to the control of money bills equally valueless? If it were not so, would not an architect who is consulted as to alterations in a house claim the right to tear down and build anew? May not this peculiar authority of the House as to money bills excluding the Senate from any proprietorship in the substantial legislation be the very method intended to prevent the "dead lock" so often threatened and so often feared? May it not be the plan adopted by the sages of the Constitution to keep the wheels running without hazard of losing supplies by conflicting bodies?

But it is not necessary to assume or assert so much as this proposition involves. It is enough to say now to the House as a matter of political ethics: Stand on your superior vantage-ground! Adhere to your own rule of action and your own principle of retrenchment! Bate not a jot of heart or hope, but press right onward to the relief of a deficient Treasury and a plundered people! Thus acting you will be crowned with the approbation of a grateful constituency.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION.

In this grapple between the representatives of State sovereignties and the Representatives of the people it would be as well before the final struggle and test to know precisely in what consist the respective elements of strength. What is their vigor as derived from the Constitution? If in seeking this knowledge we find our quarrel just we shall have the added strength of conscious rectitude, and we will not fail.

The first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution declares that—

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Now, what is meant by bills for raising revenue? Does the clause apply to all "money bills," and does it include "appropriation bills?" I maintain that it does, and that that was the meaning of the clause. Bills for spending as well as for the raising of money are to be considered as belonging in their origin to the House. "All clauses," says Cushing, "relative to taxation are divisible into two classes, namely, those which relate to raising revenue only and, second, those which embrace both the raising and spending of money." The constitutions of New Hampshire and Massachusetts use the term "money bills" to include the raising and appropriation of money. In Georgia, and perhaps in other States, appropriating moneys is used in order to be more cautious and definite.

CONTEMPORANEOUS DISCUSSION.

In the discussion of this clause in the constitutional convention, as will appear in Madison's Debates, volume 3, pages 1306, et seq., all the eminent debaters regarded "money bills" as within the signification of "revenue." To originate and tax, to tax and appropriate was, by the constitutional fathers, considered grouped in one subject—"money bills." "Money bills"—the exact language of English statesmen—had reference to all uses of the money raised.

ENGLISH DEFINITIONS OF MONEY BILLS.

In order, however, accurately to define the constitutional clause, we go with the commentator Judge Story to its source. He makes no question as to the origin of this clause:

It is borrowed from the British House of Commons, of which it is the ancient and indisputable privilege and right, that all grants of subsidies and parliamentary aids shall begin in their house, and are first bestowed by them, although their grants are not effectual to all intents and purposes until they have the assent of the other two branches of the legislature. (2 Story, § 831.)

BLACKSTONE AND STORY AS AUTHORITY.

Blackstone, with his usual perspicuity, enforces the statement of Story by a clear statement of the functions of the Commons in this relation. I quote from his first book, page 169:

The peculiar laws and customs of the House of Commons relate principally to the raising of taxes and the election of members to serve in Parliament.

First, with regard to taxes, it is the ancient, indisputable privilege and right of the House of Commons that all grants of subsidies or parliamentary aids do begin in their house and are first bestowed by them; although their grants are not effectual to all intents and purposes until they have the assent of the other two branches of the legislature. The general reason given for this exclusive privilege of the House of Commons is that the supplies are raised upon the body of the people, and therefore it is proper that they alone should have the right of taxing themselves.

But such an experiment will hardly be repeated by the Lords under the present improved idea of the privilege of the House of Commons, and in any case where a money bill is remanded to the Commons all amendments in the mode of taxation are sure to be rejected.

In reading the history of similar legislation in England, I find in May's Parliamentary Practice that we are conforming to the English mode in this respect. I shall take leave (by the favor of the House) to make some elaborate remarks upon this subject. They touch the constitutional functions of the House. They are entirely unpartisan in conception as in delivery.

The English system as to appropriation bills allows peculiar privileges for retrenchment—never for increase except under extraordinary circumstances; and shall we, the Representatives of the American people,—we who are specially charged with the initiation of money bills—shall we be behind the Commons of England in claiming the privilege which they fought for against the prerogative of the Crown and the assumptions of the House of Peers? I trust there is spirit enough in this House, irrespective of party, to maintain its organism as it was intended to be and as it was modeled after the English system.

Why, sir, do not gentlemen know that to-day in the House of Peers they dare not amend an appropriation bill from the Commons, but that perfunctorily and with certain formalities they assent, and "assent" only to those bills making appropriations?

Let me quote from Mr. May:

The legal right of the Commons to originate grants cannot be more distinctly recognized than by these various proceedings; and to this right alone their claim appears to have been confined for nearly three hundred years. The Lords were not originally precluded from amending bills of supply; for there are numerous cases in the journals in which the Lords' amendments to such bills were agreed to; but in 1671 the Commons advanced their claim somewhat further by a resolving nem. con., "That in all aids given to the king by the Commons the rate or tax ought not to be altered;" and in 1678 their claim was urged so far as to exclude the Lords from all power of amending bills of supply. On the 3d of July, in that year, they resolved—

"That all aids and supplies and aids to His Majesty in Parliament are the sole gifts of the Commons; and all bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords." It is upon this latter resolution that all proceedings between the two houses in matters of supply are now founded.

The principle is acquiesced in by the Lords, and, except in cases when it is difficult to determine whether a matter be strictly one of supply or not, no serious difference can well arise. The Lords rarely attempt to make any but verbal alterations in which the sense or intention is not affected; and even in regard to these, when the Commons have accepted them, they have made special entries in their journal, recording the character and objects of the amendments and their reasons for agreeing to them. So strictly is the principle observed in all matters affecting the public revenues that where certain payments have been directed by a bill to be made into and out of the consolidated fund, the Commons have refused to permit the Lords to insert a clause providing that such payments should be made under the same regulations as were applicable by law to other similar payments.

This would seem to make it clear that all grants or appropriations, all parliamentary aids to the executive in the shape of moneys, are understood as connected with the raising of revenue. The mere raising of it by taxation is no pleasant privilege and no salutary safeguard. The spending of the money for specific objects of public good is the higher privilege and right. So it has been regarded in a majority of the States where corresponding provisions are inserted as to the origin of such money bills.

How far the House may go in tacking on legislation not strictly belonging to revenue or appropriation is a study for the philosophic statesman. He will find its practice by no means uniform. Although in England the Lords have endeavored to check this mode of legislation, yet here it may be an open and debatable question. But in such an exigence as the present condition of our business and affairs I would not hesitate to tack remedial provisos and conditions to the disbursement of public money, so as to effectuate reform and stop prodigality. The House has not hesitated; and if it awakens a tempest at the other end of the Capitol, it will only prove a summer thunder-storm, with a clearer blue and a purer atmosphere in the sky after it is over.

It is not difficult to trace the reason of this constitutional right. Blackstone explains it, and the parliamentary history of England illustrates his explanation. The Commons represents the people, and the supplies come from the body of the people. It is their estate which is administered when supplies are voted. The Lords came in originally for a small modicum of the power only because they held a large share of the property of the realm; a reason which in no valid sense applies to our Senate, which represents not their own estates, nor the people, nor their property. If the Senate may simply propose amendments or simply concur in them, it does not derogate from the high privilege of the commonalty to restrain lavish and improvident appropriations. To allow the Senate to concur is easy and pleasing; to allow them to propose amendments is respectful and courteous; but to allow them to so propose as to add immense sums to gratify the craving of a greedy Executive and a horde of salaried parasites, is to place in peril of explosion or escape the very motive-power for the machinery of government. To allow the Senate to reject our bills, to permit radical alterations, and to change the conditions of the disbursement of money—would it not give the Senate equal power with the House in raising and spending money? Would it not nullify and render meaningless the clause of the Constitution which Judge Story derives from the British constitution? Would it not in effect destroy the equilibrium of the Federal system, by giving to Nevada, with its fifty thousand people and its bonanza Senators, a power of taxation to nullify New York, with its five millions of people and its diffused wealth? Was the equality of the States intended to be outside of the Constitution or within it? If within it, then Nevada in money bills must remain as to New York as 1 in 100. This is the very history of the compromise by which this debatable clause was fixed in the Constitution.

Judge Story says that the same reasons do not exist to the same extent, for the same exclusive right in our House of Representatives in regard to money bills as exist for such a right in the House of Commons. Had he lived to see the demoralizing results of our civil war; had he read our investigations and reports of malfeasance in office; had he observed the tendency of the Senate to grow in power by the patronage it fed on; had he seen governors of States newly elect rush from their local capitals to secure the curule chair of the Senate for its six years of easy dignity, unrestricted patronage, and self-contented power; had he seen the luxury of living, the frippery of fashion, the magnificence of our Federal city, the mushroom growth of meretricious ostentation, the pride of official presumption, and the long retinue of obsequious clientage which follows in the wake of senatorial dignity, not to speak of the pomp of the unrepresentative southern Senator or the liveried carriage of a northern Senator; had he seen the senatorial fasces united to scourge Andrew Johnson, a faithful Executive, for resisting senatorial decrees, he would have found many counterparts in our day to remind him of the worst days of Roman decline, and many reasons which did not occur to him as a contemporary of Clay, Webster, and Calhoun for the almost exclusive right of the House over that senatorial patronage which can only live by confirmations and supplies.

Was it not enough to give to the Senate a part of the treaty-making power and the exclusive confirming power as to Federal appointments? Was it not enough to give the Senate the veto over the Executive will as to his subordinates? Granting these powers, why does not the same reason exist here as in England for the deposit of this dangerous purse power in the House? Is not the lower House here, as in England, presumed to be nearer the fountain of popular will and intelligence? Does it not more readily, both as to time and desire, answer the popular call to hinder all evil courses in the Executive Departments? Has it not more speedy means to investigate misconduct and punish and impeach? Has it not more ample sources of special and local information? Does it not, as with electric touch, on instant urgency, expose and represent the very whims and caprices, if you please, or what is better, the opinions and feelings, of the people? Do not its members, by telegraph and mail, by newspapers and record, by more familiar acquaintance and intercourse, reach the popular ear and more readily obtain the popular verdict? Are they not, therefore, every two years, if not every session or week, dependent on the popular wish for support, for honor, for comfort in duty and solace in trial, for succor in emergency as to character and standing; in fine, for those sustaining pillars and ornamental graces which make office an honorable trust, and its service an ennobling mark of dignity? And when it comes to the imposition of taxes, or the payment of money drawn from toil, will they not be more heedful and vigilant than a body whose tenure of office is more permanent and less democratic, and whose habits and position are less popular and more aristocratic?

In answering these questions, it is readily ascertained why the House is more changeable as to its composition, in men and parties; why it is in emergencies the only refuge against wrong and corruption; why the people who are depressed and distressed as to their agricultural, commercial, or manufacturing interests look first to the popular branch for relief. The Senate is not a help; it is a clog to popular relief. It is so by the very nature of its constitution. Wholesome legislation is not to be expected of it, as from the House. From the latter should and do generally spring those measures which ameliorate and bless.

Even in the States where the tenure of senators is less than that of the Federal Senators, the provision of the constitutions as to money bills and their origin is preserved. Some of the States, in their early history, even gave to the lower branch exclusive jurisdiction over such measures.

BRITISH PRECEDENTS.

But all such clauses point to the British constitution. In the light of that nebulous, unwritten, but remarkable entity we find the reasons for their existence; ay, sir, we find in them motives as pure as ever animated Cato or Sydney, Hampden or Washington, for the maintenance of our right, now sought to be intrenched upon by the Senate, and as to which we are admonished in an amazing way by the President's message just read.

It is both instructive and pertinent to this inquiry to consider the growth of the Commons' right of supply. At first the exactions were of feudal origin; all aids to the Crown, however, in the times of the Tudors were freely voted by Parliament.

Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution in regard to that clause which says that the lower House of Congress shall have the origination of money bills and the Senate only can propose amendments or concur with them, gives the reason for that rule.

Mr. KASSON. Does my friend also claim that the Constitution provides that this House alone shall originate appropriation bills?

Mr. COX. I will come to that in a moment; I see it is troubling the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. Not at all; it seems to trouble the two gentlemen from New York. The phrase in the Constitution is "bills for raising revenue."

Mr. COX. It has been interpreted by many of the States and by many of our commentators that the term "bills for raising revenue" includes all money bills. In some States the constitutions contain the words "appropriation and money bills." But according to our practice, according to the general interpretation, according to the reasons that lie below, and, as I shall show, according to the debates in the constitutional convention, that clause of the Constitution itself is the true source of this moneyed power. It includes appropriations. It is the old power of the Commons to hold the purse against the sword. For six hundred years in England it fought royalty with its prerogatives, backed by the usurping insolence of the peers. It has only been modified in this country because the Senate happens to represent sovereign States; but, as Judge Story well says, the House is nearer to the people; it is more frequently elected; it has more local information, and hence therefore originates money bills; and the House, if they are firm and honest, if they are parliamentary in the old heroic Saxon mold, should demand from the Senate that their prerogatives should not be interfered with, especially when the people demand it.

Mr. HURLBUT. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to consider that the Senate of the United States is in any manner analogous to the hereditary House of Peers in England?

Mr. COX. I only repeat what Judge Story says; I do not now profess to judge upon this matter myself. If my citations (which I ask leave to print) are read and properly considered, they will help to disentangle us, or at least be a key to the dead-lock which threatens us.

But, Mr. Speaker, I did not propose to speak very long or to speak at all upon this question. It is perhaps a little indelicate for me, situated as I am, to come down upon the floor and speak at all after the suggestion made the other day by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who is absent.

But one thing ought to be borne in mind, and especially by this side of the House, that the people are demanding, especially in view of the deficit now threatened in the Treasury, not that we shall issue new bonds or create new debts or add to our taxation system, already the most burdensome in all the world, but they are demanding, as a good housewife would demand about her domestic economy, that we cut down the expenses of this Government; and if the Senate does not concur with us, there is their duty in the Constitution; they can simply propose amendments. They should not cripple our efforts, nor stop the wheels of the state. To avoid this, is the very object of their inferior relations to the House on money bills. The Constitution does not say that they shall stand there and insist and adhere to amendments and thus break down the machinery of the Government, but they are at liberty, as once the Peers of England were, to propose or to concur in amendments. Hence in the conference committee we may agree on many matters where mistakes may have been made. But one thing is sure, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen, that the main contest in the coming election will depend upon the fairness of those who seek the popular suffrage in reaching out after economy. The people do not want those economists who are all the time extravagant and who never go forward in the work of cutting down expenditures; men who, like some upon the other side of the House—thank God they are very few—think they are starving because they do not wear purple and fine linen and fare sumptuously every day.

Mr. FOSTER. Kentucky jean. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. It would be a very happy thing if more persons, both republicans and democrats, wore homespun. It would be a good thing if the Government itself wore more homespun. [Laughter.] But what I am referring to is not so much what you put on, as how you behave. [Laughter and applause.] I do not care how my friend from Ohio is dressed, I respect him; I suspect he is arrayed in fine linen; perhaps in royal English broadcloth, upon which he has fixed a high tariff. [Laughter.] I am too near-sighted to see just how he is dressed, but the reporters will get it. I suspect that my friend is trying to affect some votes in Ohio and Indiana in our favor; I sometimes suspect him, owing to some spasms of goodness, as having a little leaning to our side of the House. I am glad he has made this reference to an honest, plainly-dressed man, who has, as chairman of Accounts, been taking care of our accounts so honestly, and when he goes before the people of Indiana to give another account, as their man for governor, they will take good care of him. [Applause.]

MODE OF ENGLISH APPROPRIATIONS.

In the Commons, there is what would seem to us a paradox. When the supplies for the service of the year have all been granted, the Committee of Supply discontinues its sittings; but then the Ways and Means Committee have yet to act. There is a revenue called a consolidated fund, and the several grants come out of it and a bill is passed to that effect. That is the English appropriation bill. The bill enumerates all the grants of the session; and, by a prudence we should imitate, it orders no illegal use of the supplies.

When these formalities are complied with and the appropriation bill is passed both houses, then it is fit to receive the royal assent. It is handed back to the Commons, its source. When Parliament is prorogued, as I have seen it, by the lord commissioners—or, as sometimes occurs, by the sovereign—the speaker carries the appropriation bill to the bar of the House of Peers. The speaker tells royalty that the Commons have given the supplies, and the money bills receive assent. It is given in the old royal Norman French, and as said by a lady, it is quite an elegance of politics: La reyne remercie ses bons sujets, accepte leur bénévolence et ainsi le veult. A benevolence, a free gift, remember, not a forced loan from the Lords and Commons; but from the Commons alone to the sovereign. The Peers sit humbly by and acquiesce.

Sometimes the Commons votes grants of money with an assurance to make it good. There are a few other exceptional modes of raising and disbursing money. I do not refer to them, although they defer always to the inalienable right of the Commons to dictate the uses of private means to public purposes. He who does not recognize this in England mistakes her whole history. He who does not know that the Lords are as sheep before the shepherd, the Commons being the real House of Lords and the House of Lords the veriest commonplace, is illy read in the history of Parliament and its struggles.

MACAULAY'S LESSONS ON "MONEY BILLS."

Perhaps no Englishman ever gave so careful a study of the practice of Parliament under the English constitution as Lord Macaulay. Sometimes he searched a whole year to elucidate one reign or one political epoch. In his third volume he reaches the era of William and Mary. No portion of English history comes so near to our own one hundred years ago as that which occurred during the revolution of 1688. The circumstances which justified and the causes which produced that revolution were not dissimilar to our own. If stamp taxes were grievances to the colonies the ship-money had not been less grievous to Englishmen. When the new settlement passed to William and Mary nobody denied that all duties which had been granted to the Crown for a fixed term of years might be constitutionally exacted till that term expired; but it was denied, and to the mortification and disgust of the "Dutchman King," that the revenues which had been settled by Parliament on James II for life, could be claimed by William and Mary. Whether it was during the reign or life of James was contested by English statesmen. The House sided with Somers, and held that the defunct king could not have the revenues run with his person. Then began a splendid parliamentary effort for reform. It can be likened to no other in this country than that begun by this Congress against corruption and waste. Well does Macaulay in summing up this portion of the conflict remind us that "during the conflict which fifteen successive Parliaments had maintained against four successive kings, the chief weapon of the Commons had been the power of the purse, (Macaulay, volume 11, page 36,) and never had the representatives been induced to surrender that weapon without having speedy cause to repent of their too credulous loyalty."

As during the reign of the Stuarts, so during the past ten years of our history, Congress has been less vigilant than even the cavaliers of Charles in protesting against the large revenues and the abuses which disgraced every Department of the Government. There was no security then, as there is none now, against maladministration, except the frequent recurrences to the great popular council for pecuniary aid. Therefore, the new dynasty began with a new system of supplies. The exchequer was called on for estimates. Immediate exigencies were provided for. Monthly assessments were made. It is said that as William marched from Torbay to London the people importuned him, as they importune us now, to relieve them of their intolerable burdens. The chief of these was hearth-money.

HEARTH-MONEY.

It was the meanest tax ever levied, unless it be our tariff taxes on woolens, iron, and quinine. It was unequal. It pressed the poor; it was light on the rich; dukes paid but little more than peasants. Families were disturbed at meals; bed-rooms were forced; the very trencher on which the barley loaf was divided among the poor children and the pillow from under the head of the lying-in woman were taxed and seized by a remorseless hand. Besides, the tax was farmed out to rascals, whose counterpart is only to be found in our custom-houses. There was a tax in Rome once which was levied upon the very offal of mankind. "My son," said an emperor, "the coin smells good, whatever may be the odor of the thing taxed." The hearth-money came in all too regularly, but was not of a pleasant savor, except to the goldsmiths who advanced money on it. Where was the remedy? In the Lords? Did they strike down this hearth-tax? No! The Commons was the refuge. It gave relief to the hearth, and the smoke that curled from the chimney of the English peasant was incense to the grand body of the people represented in the Commons.

Again, in 1690, the revenue came again before the Commons. The reform had not been consummated. Salaries and pensions were enormous. Independent members, like Sedley, played their jests of pleasantry on the civil list; but sarcasm, jests, and invective fell powerless on the mailed form of tyranny. The civil list, however, only provoked ill-humor, which soon evaporated. It was so easy then as now to laugh off the details as little. The income in lieu of the old feudal services had remained. Appeals were made on behalf of William, who had saved the nation from popery, who had delivered the church from persecution. In vain whig and tory joined in the Commons against the incomes, and placed all disasters at the door of a too liberal Parliament in the days of the Stuarts. Experience had taught them; and though a compromise was made whereby some of the excise was fixed for life on the sovereign for the household and civil list, yet William growled at the grudging Commons; but the Commons established a precedent and a principle, and protected posterity against indiscreet liberality, while furnishing a code for a new hemisphere.

ENGLISH CIVIL LIST AND OUR OWN PRODIGALITY.

I venture to say that upon this civil list—then considered by the king so meager—there was not so much prodigality as the last ten years show in this Congress. In recent Parliaments, Englishmen like Sir Charles Dilke have shown what extravagant largesses have been granted to the numerous family and dependents of the queen!

This republican member of Parliament puts to shame our republican practice. The House may remember that this civil list was held sacred from parliamentary reduction during the whole reign. But Sir Charles held in 1872, as we hold now, that the House can examine into expenditures, if not question their right. How he tore the veil from the English pensioners, the masters of the buck-hounds and fox-hounds and the yeomen of the guard! How he opened to the shafts of ridicule the lord of the bed-chamber! How like the gentlemen of our Appropriations Committee he stigmatized the sinecures and useless offices; how he discovered the charlatanry of double offices with double salaries, like that of constable of Windsor—offices with only charges and no duty; how he displayed the public expense for lordlings and princelings, for royal yachts and palace repairs, for masters of the horse and royal chamberlains, with duties more mysterious than proper, for robes, collars, and badges, for presents, missions, and clothing for royal trumpeters; how he opened the privy purse to the ridicule of sensible Englishmen; how, in fine, he demanded reform in sustaining the carriages and equipages of great personages, can be found rehearsed in pure English in Hansard, ccx, page 254, and can be found equaled only in the corrupt days of France, when John Law gambled, or the worse days here when worse men rule. Talk about our post-tradership, District and whisky rings, navy-yards and naval frauds, expensive diplomatic nonsense, corrupt custom-houses, and worse Indian complications—all these in most unhappy detail, running into and out of Congress, through courts and into all the public service—these parasites must remain still further to fatten on the prevalent corruption. An honest Congress may not investigate nor even stay the unpleasant tide by fresh rules or by the ever-during power it holds over the purse. Why? Because the Senate says, no!

THE HIGHER POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE HOUSE.

By an unexampled popular uprising the people sent to this Congress nearly a two-thirds majority favorable to economy and retrenchment. It was well known that the House had no power over general legislation except in connection with the Senate and the President. But it was well known that in reference to retrenchment the House stood upon a higher plane, with greater functions and more responsibility than either Senate or President. It held the purse and it could withhold supplies. It could open the purse and affix conditions to the use of its contents. It could give or refrain as it pleased. It was the disburser, subject to certain conditions clearly fixed in the Constitution and recognized by the traditions and practice under the British constitution. The Senate might modify our money bills to make them either more palatable or more just; the President might approve or negative them; and while the House is not in terms the exclusive legislature on this vital topic, its paramount voice was to be regarded as the creative voice. It cannot be disregarded without violating the spirit and letter of the Constitution.

The election of gentlemen here confers by the election the entire power possessed by the electors. Under our Constitution, until amendment, it is irrevocable. You, gentlemen, are but the deputies of the people to carry out this parliamentary authority. If there is any defect in executing the electoral will, it is yours. You cannot go home, ducking to the Senate, without reproof from and damage to the constituent. You are not merely responsible to the first district of Ohio or the thirtieth district of New York. Your action binds your fellows. The safety and good of all are embraced in the Constitution, and you are the trustee for every person in the land. By yielding to the Senate, on a question of supplies, you give up to strangers, or at best but remote relations, the economy of that household of which you are the stewards. Your indenture is written and interpreted. You durst not defer to those not parties in its particular execution. No pledges you have made as to this or that reform or retrenchment can change your relation to the Senate or to the Constitution. Your party fealty is nothing before your oath to the organic ordinance. Your instructions are crystallized and set. They are crown jewels of popular sovereignty. In the matter of appropriations here, as supplies in Britain, you may be concurrent in a fractional incidental way, but you are independent in the integrity of your specific exclusive duty.

If courtesy and conference fail to reconcile the two Houses, the responsibility falls on the branch which encroaches. There is no umpire except the vote of the people in re-electing the House, or the slower remedy in this country of reforming the Senate by filling the places of expiring Senators. In England when the Lords become recusant the late and sure remedy is summary. A new set of peers are created by the ministry; and the Commons become the creators and masters of the Peers. Therefore, for a stronger reason in this country, we must insist and adhere to our constitutional duty and trust to the righteous judgment of the people.

In all sciences—

Says Lord Bacon—

they are the soundest that keep close to particulars. Indeed, a science appears to be best formed into a system by a number of instances drawn from observation and experience, and reduced gradually into general rules.

The mind which would make law without heeding minute particulars has neither observed the phenomena of the material world, nor understands the first clause of the social contract.

From the numerous precedents of English history, interpreting our own Constitution, we may infer the inner meaning of that constitution which gives to the House the controlling influence in money bills.

CONGRESS TAKES ACTION IN 1872.

In further illustration of the power of the House, let me refer to a report made to this House on the 27th February, 1871, (Forty-first Congress, third session, Report No. 42.) It seems that a committee of conference on the part of the House was charged with the duty of conferring with a similar committee of the Senate. A question of privilege was raised by resolution of the House in reference to a tax bill. The bill had originated in the Senate. It continued the income tax until after December, 1869. A respectful resolution of the House called in question the power of the Senate. The bill was sent to the Senate with the resolution. It involved a constitutional privilege of the House. True, it referred to the imposition of taxes, and not appropriations. At that time the House maintained its privilege. The report of that committee naturally looked to the British constitution as the model for our own on revenue matters. Was not the balance of power between the two Houses affected? That report asserted that our constitutional clause was adopted as a compromise, and the committee took care to claim the sole power of the House to originate "money bills." That power was considered by them a safeguard against the oppression of the people. It was therefore considered as properly lodged in that body which most naturally represented and which was most directly controlled by the people.

Referring to the British precedents which I have already quoted, the committee affirmed that the acquiescence of the Lords in the privileges of the Commons was of so clear a nature that the Lords could not amend money bills so as to alter the intention of the Commons. That intention went not only to the amount of the rate or charge, whether by increase or reduction, but to its duration, its mode of assessment, its levy, its collection, its appropriation, its management. It justifies in the precedents quoted, not merely the right of the House to originate, but to appropriate and manage, by proper provisos and amendments, all moneys that come into the Treasury by taxation. Whoever shall pay, receive, manage, or control such moneys are within the rule laid down by the Constitution, copied in the spirit of jealous freedom from our British ancestors.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL COMPROMISE.

When our fathers considered the question of taxation and representation there was a contest for power between the large and small States; but the compromise consisted in concessions to the small States, which were specifically counterbalanced by the provision that money bills should originate in the House of Representatives, where the people were represented according to numbers.

The origin of this clause as to money bills is attributed to Charles Pinckney in his notes of the Constitution, though Dr. Franklin after introduced it in committee. The people's money should not be voted away by the Senators representing States. It was held to be an aristocratic privilege to vote away other people's money regardless of the source from which it came, and for which there was no direct responsibility. The people should know who disposed of their money, and how. "It is a maxim," said Dr. Franklin, "that those who feel can best judge." Hence, the House was given the paramount power over all money bills. Mr. Gerry considered the clause relative to money bills as the corner-stone of the accommodation between the large and small States. It is absolutely certain, as a careful study of the debates will disclose, that the words "money bills" as used in the British constitution, were the synonyms for the words "revenue bills" used in ours. Mr. Webster has used the words "money bills" in the same connection. The reasoning for this principle first grows out of the hereditary nature of the British House of Lords, and to the continuance and perpetuity of a body known as our Senate, each one of whose members holds through three successive Congresses.

The English analogy is a more striking one the more it is considered. We even followed the English Committee on Ways and Means in our First Congress, which was authorized not only to originate all revenue measures, but those of taxation and appropriation. This practice is not peculiar to later days. In 1832 it was again asserted, and in other instances it was asserted by the control and to the destruction of two appropriation bills: one in 1856 and another in 1865. To these I shall refer in detail.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of privilege altogether; it is higher; it is a question of constitutional power. The House is the sole judge of the manner, the measure, and the time of imposing taxes or disbursing them. The committee to which I have referred, consisting of Messrs. Hooper, Allison, and Voorhees, followed the English precedents which I have quoted, and deferred to the Senate only in its right to propose or concur with amendments.

TWO APPROPRIATION BILLS FAILED IN TWENTY YEARS.

This question of disagreement between the two Houses on appropriation bills is neither new in this country nor in England. The most conspicuous instances of disagreements in this country grew out of the legislation on the slavery question, and upon an Army bill. The Journal of the House of August 6, 1856, shows the beginning of this disagreement. The House at that time was republican and the Senate democratic. A proviso to the Army bill (Journal, page 1383) forbade that the money appropriated should be drawn from the Treasury until certain prosecutions in Kansas should be dismissed and those restrained of liberty released. This proviso passed the House by a vote of yeas 84, nays 69, almost a party vote. Colfax, Giddings, Grow, Washburne, and others voted for it. Another proviso substantially the same (page 1387) was passed—yeas 82, nays 60. The Senate disagreed to the provisos, and the House insisted, on a motion by Mr. Stevens to recede. There was a full vote, and the republican House insisted upon retaining the provisos. That contest continued until the disagreement was so wide that Congress adjourned, and the appropriation bill was lost. The last vote, on a motion of Mr. Campbell for adherence, was 101 yeas to 97 nays.

On page 1622 of the Journal of August 30, the Army bill came back for the last time on this proviso:

That no part of the military forces of the United States for the support of which appropriations are made by this act shall be employed in aid of the enforcement of any enactment heretofore passed of the bodies claiming to be the territorial Legislature of Kansas.

The vote on this proviso was yeas 101, nays 98. This was a party vote. The present financial leader of the Senate, Mr. JOHN SHERMAN, voted against striking out the proviso, (page 1623.) It therefore appears by the action of this House, when the republican party was virtuous and skilled in legislation that for the purpose of rescuing the soil of Kansas from the black stain of slavery they were willing to defeat the Army bill.

I came into Congress the following session and the main objection I had to combat on the stump in that canvass was the admirable stand taken by my competitor in favor of holding the purse of the Government against its use to sustain the evil spirit of slavery, the suspension of the habeas corpus, and the barbarous code of the Legislature of Kansas. The speeches of that day are full of philippics against Draco and Jeffries, Russian serfdom and Spanish slavery. Standing armies were denounced; the dread of their violence and the dangers likely to ensue were held up in every light before the House and the country. It was stoutly maintained by the republican party in the day of its purity that the sword should not have weight in the scale of American justice. Europe was appealed to with its 2,000,000 armed men. The songs of liberty were repeated upon this floor as lyrics lost amid the clash of arms. Our Army was then but 14,000 strong, and, though the proviso did not annul the Kansas code, yet it declared it absolutely powerless and not to be enforced with the bayonet. The proviso was held to be constitutional, legal, just, and reasonable. It was Congress and Congress alone which could use, as occasion required, the money and the sword. The Senate was denounced as assuming a position memorable in the historic page of the Stuarts. Charles had lost his head and James his crown. Revolution was openly proclaimed; but it was revolution only against the known opinions of Senators.

The House would not then bow before the Senate at its nod. Latin was summoned to aid the cause of the gallant republicans—which was interpreted by scholarly republicans, "that when Senators get mad the people feel the scourge." The result was that the Senate stood firm and the House firmer. The result showed subsequently that the republican party made strength by their determination to sustain the commonalty against the Senate.

I have intimated that two appropriation bills have failed because of an irreconcilable disagreement between the two Houses. On the 2d day of March, 1865, when the miscellaneous bill was under consideration, Mr. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, moved an additional section to the bill. It was intended that no person should be tried by court-martial or military commission in any State or Territory where the courts of the United States were open with certain exceptions, and that all proceedings contrary to that proviso should be vacated. It was further held that all persons under sentence in that peculiar mode of trial should either be discharged or delivered to the civil authorities.

On that proviso Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, raised a point of order; but it was subsequently ruled in order by Schuyler Colfax, the Speaker of the House. Mr. Davis strenuously and eloquently contended that while he would not cast any imputation upon the administration, he would contend against destroying the foundation of the popular safety. While he confined the amendment to the so-called then loyal States, so as not to strip the Government of any power to suppress rebellion, he rose to the height of a great argument for personal liberty, by annulling all illegal military commissions and enlarging all those illegally found under sentence of illegal military commissions. It must be remembered that this proviso was introduced into a republican House and by a republican. His spirit was instinct with the virtue which belongs to our common freedom. He was ably seconded by the present Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] who gave instances of civilians of unimpeachable character being thrown into prison and detained for months and subjected to trial by military commission for alleged violations of the statutes of New York, and only discharged when this military tribunal could find nothing against them.

The extreme measures of that Congress found championship in the House of Representatives, and no threat of the defeat of the appropriation bill, involving millions, lessened the force of that championship. Some sneered at it as a general jail delivery. Mr. Schenck was one of them. Mr. Stevens, while admitting that courts-martial were often composed of men ignorant of law, refused to reverse such decisions and "turn loose God knows whom on the demand of the House of Representatives fixed to an appropriation bill."

It is needless for me to refer to the details of that debate. It is enough to say that never was there exhibited in the best days of English contest against prerogative, and in the conflict of the Commons against the King, more knowledge and coolness. When that miscellaneous bill failed by the attack of freemen in a republican House, it was felt that civil law was still supreme, and that every man was able to breathe freer in the hope of the peaceful reign of liberty by submission to law.

Afterward, as will appear from the Globe of March 3, 1865, page 1421, when the disagreement was again reported to the House certain small provisions like that of light-houses and gas-l'ght were agreed to. They were large in number and amount, and covered all the business details of the various amendments of the House. But when the conference committee reached the radical diversity of opinion, Mr. Davis stated that while the majority of the Senate concurred in the principles involved, the majority had refused in two votes to pass the amendments. It was insisted that the Senate might pass the proviso as a separate bill; but these lords of the Senate refused. An important appropriation bill, with a proviso touching the right of every citizen and the endurance of republican institutions, was reported back to the House under a grave disagreement, and the fundamental principles of liberty were vindicated. The bad practices of the Government introduced into the jurisprudence of the Federal Government under the general title of the rules and usages of war, together with new crimes without any authority, were regarded as of more consequence than the mere temporary provision of a miscellaneous appropriation bill.

All honor to the gentlemen of that Congress, not always careful of personal liberty, but with a sufficient number of republicans to join with the democrats to vindicate the primary ideas of freedom. When, therefore, at twelve o'clock on the 3d of March, 1865, the Speaker announced that the parting hour had come, personal liberty stood high aloof above mercenary consideration, and the departing Speaker in adjourning the Thirty-eight Congress sine die made a lyric orison to the Father of us all that he would lead all our wandering citizens to the old fold.

While heaven's wide arch resounds again,
With "peace on earth, good-will to men."

Thus, Mr. Speaker, on two occasions, both of them in republican Houses, have the fundamental ideas inherited from our English ancestry been vindicated, and the right of the Commons to fix conditions to the voting of money has lifted that standard by which alone through nearly a thousand years the safety of the public charters has been secured.

Mr. Speaker, much discussion has been had and much bitterness created between the two Houses in reference to retrenchment. My relation to the House and its business deters me from any partisan appeal which would intrench upon the honor or respect due to the Senate. If there were no rules requiring the House to be decorous and complaisant toward that body, it would afford me no gratification to disregard that moral comity which leads us into unison for the common weal. It is not to be regarded as overstepping the limits of discussion in which the temporary Speaker might properly indulge in defense of the organization of the lower branch of Congress if he did point out—not merely from English precedent, not merely from the glorious history of the Commons, but from the present condition of our Treasury and its finances—the immense responsibility of that branch which would reject any measure for the facile running of the Government.

EXPENDITURES INCREASE

This Congress was called into being to restrain inordinate living beyond our resources. When our expenditures exceed our means it is time for an aggressive spirit on the part of the people and their representatives against all comers who would attack them. Need I refer you to the increased expenditures of the administration since the war ended? Comparisons between 1860 and 1870 or 1875 seem to fail of their cogency. Let me, then, take some of the years immediately after the war.

The post-office expenditures in 1868 were $10,000,000 less than now. The Indian expenditures are nearly $4,000,000 more now than in 1868. Why should we appropriate for surveying the public lands nearly four times as much in 1875 as in 1868, or double our Coast Survey expenses in the same period? Why should the judicial expenditures rush up from $700,000 to over three and a half millions from 1868 to 1875? Why should our miscellaneous expenditures in the same period be $20,000,000 more? Are these burdens of such a character as to be patiently borne? Is our present time so auspicious and prosperous that we can afford to add to instead of subtracting from our expenditures?

Besides, it is susceptible of proof from an authentic statement of the condition of the Treasury up until June 30, 1876, there will be a deficiency at the end of the present fiscal year of over twenty-four millions and a half. And the probable deficiency at the end of the year 1877 will be over $40,000,000.

Such a condition of public finances calls either for debt, taxes, or thrift. If England could hold the purse-string against the Crown, and if, through a remarkable struggle, a republican Congress could hold the purse for liberty in Kansas, for habeas corpus, free speech, and free press; if a republican Congress led by the eloquence of Henry Winter Davis could break down the miscellaneous bill, by a proviso for a fair trial under an American bill of rights and the spirit of Magna Charta, how craven and contemptible would not a democratic Congress seem should they adopt the budget fixed by a Senate in its arrogance, and in derogation of every legislative right and privilege?

It is unnecessary for me to state in detail what bills we have offered to the Senate for retrenchment. I have already spoken as to the military and diplomatic bills. The reductions on these bills were generally concurred in. Upon the first it amounted to $200,000 below the estimates. The diplomatic bill was reduced from the estimates near one-half million. In the fortification bill there was a reduction of over three millions. Upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, to which the Senate have made nearly a thousand amendments, we had proposed a reduction of over five and a half millions. On the river and harbor bill the reduction of appropriations below the estimate amounted to $770,000. On the deficiency bill we reduced from the appropriation of last year nearly $4,000,000; on the post-office bill more than $5,000,000; on the naval bill over $4,000,000; and on the Indian bill over one and a half millions. Or, sir, to sum it all up, the reduction on the bills thus far reported shows as in comparison with the estimates a reduction of $37,738,000, while the actual appropriations for the present year show a reduction thus far of nearly $23,000,000. The Army bill will show a reduction of appropriation of nearly $5,000,000. So that in the sum-total this pains-taking economy of the House of Representatives has labored to make an aggregate reduction amounting to $40,000,000. These details will be approved by a prostrate and a discriminating people.

I do not propose now to argue for or against the propriety or the utility of these reductions. They have had careful consideration in the committee and unexampled debate in the Committee of the Whole. Many of them have been approved without a vote against them. The Senate may in the end generally approve of our retrenchment, but the conciliatory disposition thus far seems lacking. Upon this retrenchment not only depend matters of a fiscal nature connected with currency, economy, taxation, and incorruptibility, but, sir, there is at stake the very organic law of constitutional liberty, derived from our English ancestors and our own American fathers. We demand that no servile submission to an inferior body should be shown by this the superior body under the sanctions of the Constitution.

I did not expect, sir, when I left the chair to speak in this way. I came down simply to ask the House to give me the privilege of printing in the RECORD some historical reminiscences connected with this struggle between the Commons and the Peers, so as to illustrate the relation which this House will sustain to the Senate in case the gentlemen in the other end of the Capitol shall insist upon their peculiar notions.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, there is but one path leading out of this cave of despair. We must break the lull and work. Public confidence will come only as we are assured that values are no longer wasted, but created. The path may be rough and the wilderness and sloughs difficult. Our path does not lie simply in the repeal of any foolish act for resumption at an early and impossible day. The extension of that day is not the only path, though it may remove many impediments. The extension of resumption must not involve, as a condition, indefinite postponement. We have riches, developed and undeveloped, for our wants, if those wants are not too imaginative. We must prepare even for a greater shrinkage of values; we must prepare for sacrifices. But one sacrifice we must not make: We cannot sacrifice the traditions, muniments, and dignities of this House of the people, this House of refuge from unjust exactions, profligate officials, and unconstitutional insolence and arrogance.

THE HEROES OF THE COMMONS.

There are many crowns to be won and many crosses to be borne in public service; but, sir, was there ever nobler crown or but one other more sacred cross than that won or borne in the parliamentary arena? French annals are crowded with such heroes. In France the States General, as early as 1355, demanded and received from a French king, John, a declaration which established the right of those assemblies to speak for the people against all comers who would despoil them. (Millar, page 309.) In later days such assemblies made France free. Mirabeau is their noblest commoner. No hirelings or claquers were about to give them prestige, notoriety, or applause; but history has honored their names in despite of the bloody eras in which they were actors. The Spanish Cortes, by pencils worthy of Velasquez and Murillo, is decorated with the forms and faces of those who spoke with an eloquence as superb as that of Castellar for the fueros of the Spanish provinces and constitution. The Pyms and Prynnes, Sydneys and Hampdens are household names as well as splendid authorities in England. They fill the measure of parliamentary renown.

And should we revert to the earlier eras of English history, even before the boy burgess, Sir Thomas More, defied royalty in the interests of free government and honest taxation, we might find names repeated almost in our own roll-call; for as early as the second Richard "Sir Peter de la Mare, knight," is less honored as the first of the Somersets than as among the first of the speakers of the Commons. Monsieur Peres de la Mare was not only a progenitor, as I reckon, of our distinguished friend from Mississippi, but he was a stout rebel, who suffered imprisonment for speaking too freely in Parliament. His imprisonment did not seal his lips. While he is remembered because he commended all feats of chivalry in one of his resolutions, he advocated liberty and the commonalty in another! He was an especial hater of corrupt rule, and became a baron of the realm as redoubtable in war as he was fearless in debate. Indeed, the entire company of parliamentary worthies in England, beginning with the morning stars, who, like the Chaucers, were both speakers and poets, furnishes us a procession of heroes in the popular cause against kings and peers, which neither Tower nor block could appall, and whose oratorical fervors were neither of selfish greed nor truckling subserviency. These will be remembered long after the dust of the disreputable mercenaries in English, Irish, and American assemblies has been blown to the winds of heaven! These will be heralded to the ages as examples worthy of honorable imitation; while the parasites of corrupt power, "who have lived without virtue and died without repentance," will have neither scrip, nor picture, nor marble—only the universal detestation of mankind to embalm their infamy.

Let us not fail nor falter in our popular faith. Let no arguments for convenience and no anxiety for remuneration or preferment lead us to forget that our place is here to baffle machinations such as the message to-day reveals. Perish the petty threats of a cunning foe, which would invoke the hurricane of popular indignation because we do not promptly succumb to a superserviceable Senate. In this conflict we have law and learning, wisdom and eloquence, and, above all, the confiding approbation of a free and incorruptible people.

Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. PHILLIPS of Kansas rose.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the debate on this subject shall now close.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I ask for only five minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will yield to me also for ten minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. There is but a single point to which I wish to direct the attention of this House and of the country before asking a vote; that is, as to where the responsibility will rest of a dead lock on the appropriation bill. Now, sir, there are three general appropriation bills which have already become laws.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] intend to yield any time?

Mr. RANDALL. There are three appropriation bills now in the Senate.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I supposed that the Speaker recognized me.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not disposed to yield now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] had the floor, but the Chair understood him to indicate a purpose to yield to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. RANDALL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Only five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to yielding for that length of time.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I desire to say but a few words. I wish to present but one or two points which have not been mentioned in this discussion. Before I do so I will thank my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] when he comes to print his remarks in regard to the British constitution as compared with our Constitution, to bear in mind that in England there is no written constitution, and consequently the powers of the different branches of the government are not defined anywhere, but are to be found in a bundle of precedents scattered all through the centuries.

In this country a law requires, first, the action of the House, next the action of the Senate, or vice versa, and then the action of the Executive. An appropriation bill must originate, not in all its parts, but the bill itself must originate in the House; but it may be amended by the Senate. That has been the history of our Government since its organization.

What I wish to say particularly is this: The other side of the House during the whole of this session have sought to put all of us upon this floor in a very awkward attitude. They have incorporated in these appropriation bills changes of general laws, changes and modifications of all the forms of the Government. They have framed their appropriation bills in those parts relating to appropriations upon the ground of what they called economy, and they base the proposed changes of law upon the same grounds.

They now propose to force these changes upon the Senate of the United States. I say that every member upon this floor has just reason to complain of the course that has been pursued. If these measures had been brought in separately, the case would have been different. But when gentlemen on the other side incorporate general legislation in appropriation bills, general legislation which they know cannot on its own merits meet the approval of the other branch of Congress, when they say to us that they will stop the wheels of government, will not furnish the supplies to keep the Government in motion unless we yield to them, they take upon themselves the responsibility before the whole country, and they cannot deny it.

I think the President of the United States in this message has acted very wisely, let me say to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] Within twelve days of the close of the fiscal year, the Executive of this nation, seeing the two Houses at a dead lock and that some of the appropriation bills which must be passed are not yet even reported from the committee, formally notifies us that the wheels of the Government must stop on the 1st of July. The responsibility for that rests not upon the Senate, but upon this House. It rests with the other side of the House to say whether they will permit the necessary appropriations to be made.

My friend from New York [Mr. WOOD] says that it is the intention of thePresident to coerce and force this House. Sir, the forcing is upon the other side. When they come here and demand legislation which they are unable to secure except in connection with the appropriation bill, they cannot hold us responsible. The President has wisely and justly thrown the entire responsibility upon them, and the people will hold them responsible.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me.

Mr. RANDALL. For how long?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I should like ten minutes; perhaps I may get through in five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations or of the Committee of Ways and Means. If there is a democracy in this House, in the pure sense of the term, I am one of the democracy of the House, the members of the Committee on Appropriations being, so far as the control of business of the House is concerned, the autocrats, while the great majority of the members blindly follow the lead of that committee, whether right or wrong.

Now, then, under the rules of the House, especially under the late amendment to Rule 120, at last we understand that the Committee on Appropriations not only control the appropriations so far as the House is concerned, but also seek to practically control all legislation, and as a result of so doing we now have a dead lock between the House and Senate on part of the appropriation bills, and the same state of affairs may exist as to the remaining appropriation bills. Now let us inquire for a moment as to the cause of the dead lock and as to how it can be broken.

Under the Constitution the House and Senate have to concur before legislation can be had, and in theory each member of the House has as much power to effect legislation as any other member; but as it is impossible for any one member to master all the details of legislation, it became necessary in organizing the House to constitute a great number of committees to prepare legislation to propose to the House, and the recommendations of different committees touching any matter they have matured should have weight with the House. For instance, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, giving its whole time, should know more of that service and its wants than the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads does, and vice versa; and so of every other one of the fifty-odd committees of the House. And, let me say right here, there is no one active committee of this House that does not have sufficient business to keep every one of its members busy the whole of the time not taken up by the sessions of the House, and this, too, however industrious or able the respective members of the committee may be.

Now, then, originally it was intended that the Committee on Appropriations should report bills to the House appropriating money to carry on the Government in pursuance of existing law, but the practice has grown up between the House and Senate to not only appropriate money by bills which come from the Committee on Appropriations, but to also stick on to such bills much of the important general and special legislation that is had, and the result has frequently been that vicious legislation has been had in this way. In other words, the necessity for passing these bills appropriating money to carry on the Government have been seized upon by mistaken or designing legislators to drag through under the rules of the House vicious legislation.

Such a practice as to legislation, it will be seen at once, gives the Committee on Appropriations under the rules undue influence and power in the control of legislation, enabling that committee to usurp the legitimate business of other committees; and now, since the late amendment to the rules of the House, the eleven members of the Committee on Appropriations, in fact I may say six members of the committee, constituting a majority of the same, practically have rendered useless nearly all the other committees of the House and control the legislation of the House. For example, it will be recollected when the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill was considered by the House that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, composed of gentlemen of as great ability and fidelity as the eminent gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations, warned the House that the legislation changing existing law as proposed by the Committee on Appropriations was vicious, and there can be no doubt that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which had only matters pertaining to the same before it, and so to speak had made such matters a specialty, were better advised as to the same than the Committee on Appropriations could have been, having as it did thousands of other important questions to determine, yet under the specious plea of economy so persistently urged by the gentlemen of the Appropriation Committee, the recommendations of the Committee on Foreign Relations were thrown to the winds, and a majority of the House blindly followed the lead of the Committee on Appropriations.

And so it has been with the most of the committees of the House. I know that the unanimous recommendations of the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, agreed upon after great investigation, (I mean Post-Office and Post-Roads,) were brushed aside by the Committee on Appropriations with a wave of the hand, and legislation by the wholesale was put upon the post-office appropriation bill, some of it in the right direction and much of it improper, ill-advised, and vicious; and in watching the exploits of some members of this Committee on Appropriations from day to day in their domineering and frequently reckless and ill-advised course I have found myself asking, "Upon what meat do these our Cæsars feed that they have grown so great?"

Mr. Speaker, it is a common thing for members on the other side of the House to say when appealed to not to wrongfully and recklessly follow the lead of the Committee on Appropriations, "O, well, I know it is wrong, but then the Senate will make it all right by amendments when we send the bills to that body."

Mr. RANDALL. Gentlemen may be a little disappointed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir; they may be. But I tell you one thing: I want it placed fairly before the House and country that the dead lock on the appropriation bills arises out of proposed changes in existing law under the lead of the Committee on Appropriations that are hastily, and in many instances recklessly, proposed; and that the majority of the House, under the crack of the party whip, are blindly following the lead of that committee, and in many instances members knowing and acknowledging that the leadership is wrong and much of the proposed legislation vicious. And I would like to see some member on the other side who is not a member of that committee get up and contradict me in this statement. [After a pause.] Not one gentleman rises.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL, (to Mr. CANNON, of Illinois.) Go ahead; take five minutes more if you wish.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Thank you; I will only take a moment or two more. Now, then, do you want to know how to get rid of this dead lock between the House and Senate? I will tell you. Let the Committee on Appropriations go to work and adopt the recommendations of the various appropriate committees of the House touching matters of general legislation upon these bills, and the members of the House, in good faith, in the interest of true economy, do what their better judgment tells them is right and proper, and not depend upon the Senate to correct known errors of the House. In other words, let us be honest politically and do as well as we know, and in less than thirty days this dead lock will be completely broken, the legislation of the session accomplished, and the country not only satisfied but rejoiced that we have honestly performed our duty and adjourned.

Now, then, a word in reply to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD,] the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. I was amused and surprised at his remarks. It has got to be fashionable for some gentlemen on that side of the House, in season and out of season, to accuse this side of the House of holding up the bloody shirt, as they call it. Now, then, who on this side of the House has spoken of the bloody shirt that appears to haunt the gentleman from West Virginia? The gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] have ably, and, so far as I noticed, correctly arraigned the other side of the House for some attempted, hasty, and ill-advised legislation, and claimed that it is not in the interest of true economy. Whereupon the gentleman from West Virginia accuses this side of the House of being opposed to retrenchment and economy, and travels out of his way to denounce us as trying to evade the true issue by holding up the bloody shirt.

Now let us see how much he favors economy. The gentleman hails from that great mountain State of West Virginia, with its magnificent rivers and splendid coast and harbors, upon whose waters float numberless ships engaged in a prosperous commerce; at least one not acquainted with the mountains of West Virginia would think so when he reads the river and harbor bill which passed this House appropriating over $400,000 for the rivers and harbors of West Virginia and only $10,000 for the Charleston harbor and many other real harbors in proportion. Yet that the future historian may not be misled as to the maritime State of West Virginia, and to illustrate the economy of the gentleman from West Virginia, as well as of this democratic House, let me state that there is scarcely a branch or river in the whole State of West Virginia proper to which this appropriation applies but what a small man could throw an elephant across by the tail; and let me state further, that the bill was reported by the gentleman from his committee on a Monday and passed by a two-thirds vote of this democratic House, so that all debate or even power to protest, except by a vote of "no," was cut off, and in the light of this record upon the part of the gentleman he grows red in the face, violent in gesticulation, and with loud voice thunders his anathemas against this side of the House for obstructing his onward march to economy and reform.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, rose.

Mr. RANDALL. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] has been attacked, or rather his suit, I think he should be heard.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have been here some four or five months a silent listener to the debates. I have endeavored to do my duty as a member here in supporting such measures as I thought right and proper. But this debate, like many others, reminds me very much of a circumstance which took place about the first year that Indiana was a State. Late one evening in November a gentleman was seen to rein up his horse at the door of a cabin on the road. He inquired whether he could stay over night. The landlady, who appeared at the door, replied, "Yes, sir; if you will put up with such fare as we can give you." The gentleman readily assented, for he was none of your eastern gentlemen; he belonged to the West. [Laughter.] Soon after the landlord appeared and took his horse and put him up. The landlady showed him into a room used as a parlor, sitting-room, dining-room, and kitchen. The man was seated before a pleasant fire, it being the latter part of November, and over the fire hung a pot of boiling water. The landlady soon came in again with a pan of corn-meal and commenced stirring it into the hot water, pouring it in with one hand and stirring it with the other until she got it to a proper consistency for what we call in the western part of the country mush. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. O, yes; we know what that is. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. She then threw in some salt and gave it another stir. Her daughter Sallie came along and said: "I expect mother has forgotten to salt the mush," and so she threw in a little salt and gave it a stir. The landlord brought in a stick of wood on his shoulder and put it down near the fire, saying, "I expect my folks have forgotten to salt that mush," and he threw in a little handful of salt and gave it a stir. [Laughter.] The landlady coming in, took up her mush and set it upon the table, and all hands were called to supper. The landlord was the first to discover it. As soon as he took the mush and put it into his milk, he said: "Ugh! you have ruined this mush; you have put too much salt in it." "Well," said the landlady, "I did not put in any more than I ought to put in it." The landlord said "I did not know you put any in, and so I salted it." "Why, mother," said Sallie, [laughter,] "I salted it because I supposed you had forgotten it." Said the traveler, "I thought it was fashionable, and so I salted it." And now it has become so fashionable for every gentleman to talk on this floor that I thought I would try it, and now propose to throw in my handful of salt. [Laughter.]

I want to say something about these blunders which have been committed, as we are told, on the other side, and in such sharp and fluent language by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I discover one of the blunders we have committed, and I will stand by that blunder, is in reducing the salary of the President of the United States from $50,000 down to $25,000 a year. That is a very terrible blunder! That is one of the blunders we have committed. [Laughter.]

Another one of the blunders we have committed is to reduce the pay of members from $5,000 to $4,500 a year. Now is that a very serious blunder? [Laughter.] I think gentlemen who voted for that will not find it so dangerous a blunder as those who voted for an increase of salary two or three years ago. [Laughter.]

Another very great blunder we have committed is in not increasing the pay of the Cabinet officers. It was attempted to be increased, and we did not do it. That is one of our terrible blunders. I am glad we did not.

Another one of our terrible blunders is that our foreign ministers are to be starved to death; that they are to be reduced from $17,000 a year down to $14,000 a year. Horrible! [Great laughter.] We cannot get a man to touch any one of them at $14,000. [Laughter.] He will not take it all; he cannot afford to go abroad and work for $14,000 a year. Not at all. [Great laughter.]

Let us look at this thing with a broader view. We want to do right. We find bankers—and I am not in favor of bankers; some are around me, and they are clever gentlemen. I believe they are gone now. We find bankers cannot make $50,000 as the President makes it, although they may have $250,000 capital. They cannot make $25,000 a year. You cannot find a mechanic who can do it. The manufacturer who may be established in the city of Philadelphia cannot make it. He cannot make $25,000, not to speak of $50,000 a year, although he may have an invested capital of over $250,000. Why should it be lamented as a blunder that we have reduced that salary from $50,000 down to $25,000? Why deplore that blunder of the Committee on Appropriations of this House? [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I have another word to say. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] made some remarks while my friend from New York [Mr. COX] was on the floor. Am I right?

Mr. FOSTER. What is it?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. The gentleman made some remarks from his seat.

Mr. FOSTER. What?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. In relation to Kentucky jeans.

Mr. FOSTER. Not in relation to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Who did you mean?

Mr. FOSTER. I meant the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] [laughter,] who once—[renewed laughter]—just allow me to finish.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Well, go on.

Mr. FOSTER. Who once boasted here of wearing Canada jeans.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I do not wish to do anybody any injustice at all——

A MEMBER. He said Canada broadcloth.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought it was Canada jeans.

Mr. COX. That was a great many years ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I do not wish to misunderstand the gentleman from Ohio. I thought at the time that I was the one to whom he alluded. I am not ashamed of my old Kentucky jeans. The people of Indiana are not ashamed of me because I wear it. He then reminded me of a circumstance which took place a few days ago. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] introduced a resolution requesting the Committee of Accounts to furnish this House with such refreshments as have been customary heretofore. [Laughter.] He is decidedly in favor of economy. [Laughter.] Now that gentleman introduced that resolution, and I want to show you what the effect will be when you pass it.

Mr. FOSTER. Did it not pass unanimously?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. It is in the hands of the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. FOSTER. Did it not pass unanimously?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. The gentleman will not ask questions; I am not on the stand now. [Laughter.] I want to show you what will be the effect. I have a memoranda of what happened two years ago, and when it is printed I want some copies sent to the gentleman's constituency as well as my own. [Laughter.]

Let me read some of the items from this account for articles furnished to the House of Representatives.

Four and seven-eighths gallons alcohol, and package for same, $13.19.
One cask of sal-soda, $26.29.
Fifty pounds tea, $7.50; two hundred and twenty pounds granulated sugar $25.30.
Two hundred and nineteen pounds powdered sugar, $25.19; six boxes of lemons, $78.
Six boxes lemons, $78; two hundred and five pounds sugar, $23.58.
Six boxes lemons, $75; two hundred and thirty-two pounds sugar, $26.58.

The next is "one hundred fans." [Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, here imitated the action of using a fan, amidst great laughter.]

Two hundred and thirty-four pounds granulated sugar, $26.91.
Two hundred and thirty pounds powdered sugar, $26.45; six boxes lemons, $72.
Six boxes lemons, $72; one hundred and ninety-eight pounds granulated sugar, $22.77.
Six boxes lemons, $72; two hundred and five pounds granulated sugar, $23.58.
Six boxes lemons, $72.
Three boxes lemons, $36; one hundred and ninety-nine pounds granulated sugar, $22.88.

The total is $1,293.08. Now, who were running this House then? [Laughter.] The trouble with a great many of our friends here, and I am sorry to see it, is that they have been here so long that looking up into those galleries they think the people there are the only constituents they have got. They forget that they have any constituents at home. If they thought a little less of the clothes that may be worn here, whether they be of broadcloth or Kentucky jean, and looked a little less at the galleries, it would be better for them. But they require only to go before the people once in two years; and that accounts for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to direct the attention of the House to a single point in regard to where the responsibility for this dead lock, if it should occur, should rest. I am advised that in 1868 quite a number of appropriation bills were not passed until after the 1st of July. As regards the situation of the appropriation bills in the present Congress let me say that of the regular appropriation bills three have already been passed by both Houses; four remain in the hands of conference committees, which conferences are called by the Senate conferees, and the House conferees have met them on every occasion when invited. There remain in the Senate now to-day three bills unacted upon, so far as I am advised, which have passed the House, the Navy, the Indian, and the river and harbor bills. The river and harbor bill has been in the Senate since April 3. And there remain in this House but two bills not acted on: one, the Army bill, now under consideration, which might have been passed by this time but for this debate, which I do not regret at all, because it is right that the people should distinguish between those who favor economy and those who keep up or desire to keep up the old habits of extravagance which the gentlemen on the other side have been so accustomed to, and under the influence of which the Departments have found it so easy to secure extravagant sums.

As a general proposition, I assert that, taking the diplomatic appropriation bill and the appropriation bills generally, all the Appropriations Committees who have preceded us during the last ten years have merely taken the estimates of the Departments, while the present committee—and I think it is conceded that no committee ever before has worked with more diligence or given more pains or labor to its work—the present committee, I say, has gone carefully over every item, and we have made no reduction from any item except when we considered we were warranted in doing it; and in many cases, lest we should seem to be excessive in our desire for economy, lest we might subject ourselves to the criticism that we were crippling the Government, we have given an amount in many cases above what a majority of the committee deemed sufficient.

I assert it here to-day as my opinion, based on the closest study and scrutiny of the history of these bills, before the Committee on Appropriations and before the House during the past ten years, that if these appropriations were made on the same principles which guide any gentlemen in this House, of whatever politics, in conducting their own business and expending their own money, instead of the appropriations being forty millions under the appropriations made last year, sixty or seventy millions of dollars would be saved to the people of this country and no harm done to any interest or any branch of the Government. And I warn both sides of this House—I do not speak for my side of the House alone—I warn both sides of the House that it is absolutely essential that you on your individual responsibility as Representatives of an oppressed and paralyzed people should come forward and, instead of casting slurs on the Appropriations Committee, should stand up in your own rights, irrespective of party drill, and sustain the committee which seeks to bring back the Government to the economy which was exercised in its administration before the period of the war.

Having said this much, I ask for a vote on the proposition to refer.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before my friend from Pennsylvania moves the previous question, I wish to call attention to some points in the history of the appropriation bills in 1868. I will just take a single year. The bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government that year did not become a law until the 20th day of July.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. Were the laws then in force which exist now, to which reference is made in the President's message?

Mr. HOLMAN. They were substantially in force.

Mr. FOSTER. I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. The same principles governed substantially at that time. The act making appropriations to supply deficiencies for that year was not passed until the 25th of July. The act making appropriations for sundry civil expenditures was not passed until the 20th of July. In other words, four of the appropriation bills in 1868 were passed after the beginning of the fiscal year and after the 1st day of July. And, indeed, gentlemen who have been here any length of time will remember, or can ascertain by looking over the statutes, that during the long sessions of Congress it has very frequently occurred that numbers of the appropriation bills did not finally get through both branches of Congress until after the close of the fiscal year.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman understands very well that at the time to which he refers unexpended balances were used; and since that time there has been a law requiring them to be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. The unexpended balances were at that time covered into the Treasury.

Mr. FOSTER. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. There have only been certain modifications of the law on the subject since that time.

Mr. RANDALL. I call the previous question on the motion to refer the President's message.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the President's message was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the message was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. LORD. I desire in behalf of the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment against Ex-Secretary Belknap to submit a resolution. On appearing in court this morning the defendant again made application for an adjournment until November, giving various reasons therefor; among them the great difficulty of bringing and retaining witnesses here in the month of July. Without detailing all the reasons given for the motion, I desire to say that the reasons presented were such and the reflection of the managers on the subject had been such that we asked leave of the Senate to confer with the House on this point.

I desire to say to the House before submitting the resolution which the managers have prepared: first, that the question of jurisdiction has been settled and the question as to the two-thirds vote will be settled before the adjournment of the court, if it shall be adjourned before the close of this session; second, I desire to state that the Senate as a court will not, so far as we can judge, sit after Congress has adjourned.

The plan of the managers on the part of the House had been this: To induce the Senate as a court of impeachment to allow Congress to adjourn and then sit as a court to carry on the case. But there are two reasons against that which render it conclusive that the Senate will not do so. The first is that many Senators doubt the power of the Senate to sit as a court of impeachment after the adjournment of Congress. The second, and the really practicable reason, is that it will be found impossible to keep a quorum of the court together after the adjournment of Congress. The managers are satisfied of this beyond all reasonable doubt, and we are satisfied that if we shall bring witnesses here from the Pacific coast and from other parts of the country with seventy-three judges the progress of the trial will be so slow that it would result in an adjournment of the court until November or December, and then all the witnesses would have to be brought back here again.

Under these circumstances the managers propose that Congress shall adjourn until some time about the 15th or 20th of November which we think the Senate will consent to. (Cries of "O, no!") As I hear objection made to my proposition I will state that we want to avoid the question as to the right of the Senate to sit as a court of impeachment during the adjournment of Congress. Now, the managers think that by meeting on the 20th of November Congress can convene and consider various matters which will not be disposed of during the present session, and in the mean time the trial can go on in the Senate and be concluded possibly in November, certainly in December. The managers therefore submit this resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, that they may receive instructions from the House, which they desire.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas in the impeachment of William W. Belknap the defendant has moved for a continuance now on account of the lateness of the season, with the difficulty which will probably attend the retaining of a full organization of the court and the urgency of other business:

Resolved, That the managers be authorized to consent to a continuance until the —— day of November next.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It seems to me that if the chairman of the board of managers representing the House is correct in his assumption that the Senate believes that the House should be in session during the trial, the adoption of this resolution would compel a convening of both Houses on the day named; because, unless both Houses convenes at that date, this resolution will substantially amount to nothing, if I understood the remarks made by my colleague before he offered the resolution.

Mr. LORD. I propose to follow up this resolution by a joint resolution that the two Houses shall adjourn to that time, say to the 20th day of November, or to an earlier or later day in that month as may be fixed upon by the two Houses; but I think a day should be fixed before the commencement of the next regular session of Congress.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to make an inquiry. I would inquire whether the managers have examined the question whether the presence of the House of Representatives be necessary in order that the Senate may go on with the prosecution of this impeachment case?

Mr. LORD. Several of the managers have considered that question, and, as one of the managers, I have no doubt the Senate may go on as a court independent of the session of Congress. It is an independent tribunal. It may adjourn when it pleases. The House may be represented by its managers, although, of course, the House must authorize its managers to go there. Several Senators concur in this opinion, but the difficulty is that some Senators do not concur, and it seems to me to be settled in the minds of all the Senators, or nearly all of them, that it would be impossible to keep a quorum of the Senate to try this case as a court of impeachment after the adjournment of Congress. But they are willing to come here a few days before the ordinary time for the meeting of Congress in order to try the case.

Mr. REAGAN. If it is understood on the part of the managers on the part of the House and the proper authorities of the Senate that a joint resolution adjourning Congress until some day in November will follow this resolution, I hope the House will adopt the resolution. It is the best thing we can now do. If the case is now taken up it will be full midsummer before we could get away. I apprehend that most members here will feel the necessity of not remaining here until September or October of this year. I will not be inclined myself, however, to put it at as late a day in November as the gentleman suggested. I think that the time required for the trial of this case will necessitate a meeting of Congress at as early a day in November as may be convenient. I certainly would be disinclined to fix a day later than the 20th of November; and it seems to me that the 10th of November would be the better time for Congress to adjourn to. As to that, however, I will not insist.

What I wanted to say was this: As I have heard the expression of opinion among members, I think I but reflect that expression when I say that, situated as we are, in view of the time that must necessarily be occupied in that trial, it will be prudent for the House to adjourn over.

On the subject of whether the House ought to be in session during the time the Senate is sitting as a court of impeachment, if it were necessary for me to give an opinion on that subject, I should say, from such examination as I have been able to give it, that I do not agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] in the opinion he has expressed. By parliamentary law the House is presumed to be in session while the trial is in progress. Occasions might arise when the managers would be required to call upon the House for instructions. As I understand both the law and the precedents, as well as the necessities of the case, it is proper that the House should be in session while the trial is going on. A friend near me suggests that any judgment of the Senate must be reported to the House.

I trust it will be the pleasure of the House to adopt the resolution which has been presented. I would be glad that the terms of the resolution should not be changed so as to fix a later time than the 20th of November.

Mr. RANDALL. My judgment is, and I desire to express it simply as a layman, in the direction of propriety and perhaps of common sense, that this question is one for the court to determine, one that belongs exclusively to the court. The court sitting in this case is the Senate of the United States. Whatever they may determine upon, I do not doubt the House will accede to. But that court is the body to determine this question, and I do not think the House is called upon to act upon it until they are apprised of what the Senate wishes in this connection.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a statement that I perhaps ought to make?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. LORD. The Senate has twice passed on this question. I desire members to hear the statement I am about to make. Before the question of jurisdiction was decided, an application was made on behalf of the defendant to adjourn the trial until November or December next. That application the Senate, after mature deliberation, refused. After the question of jurisdiction was settled, an application was again made upon the part of the defendant, accompanied by statements of quite strong reasons, for the adjournment of the case until November or December next. The House opposed the application through its managers, and the Senate refused it. The Senate therefore has twice passed upon this question, once before the question of jurisdiction was settled and once since, and in obedience to the motion of the managers of the House the application in each case was denied.

But a new state of affairs is now presented. More deliberation has been had in regard to the matter. As one of the managers—and I think all of the managers concur with me—I have no doubt whatever that if the trial now goes on and all these witnesses are brought on here, the result will be that the trial will be postponed, and the witnesses must be brought on again.

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LORD. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. It is whether these one hundred and ninety-seven witnesses will not have to come on here in November; and whether they had not better come on now than to invade the short session of Congress and drive us on to the 4th of March without concluding our business?

Mr. LORD. I will answer the gentleman. The one hundred and ninety-seven witnesses will never come except at the expense of the defendant, and the defendant will not bring them.

Mr. RANDALL. Then why not go on with the trial now? You cited that matter of the witnesses as a reason for postponing the trial.

Mr. LORD. I did not mention the one hundred and ninety-seven witnesses.

Mr. RANDALL. You mentioned the witnesses.

Mr. LORD. I did not suppose the gentleman presumed for a moment——

Mr. RANDALL. I saw it stated very authentically that there will be one hundred and ninety-seven witnesses.

Mr. HURLBUT. That is only a newspaper statement.

Mr. RANDALL. No; it was on the authority of the officer of the Senate who was to summon them.

Mr. LORD. It is fair to the gentleman to say that the defendant has served upon the managers a list of witnesses numbering one hundred and ninety-seven.

Mr. RANDALL. That is all that I say.

Mr. LORD. But I say that number of witnesses will never, in my judgment, be called at the expense of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. Then you can go on with the trial the sooner.

Mr. LORD. I want the House to understand that the Senate has decided this question both before and after the question of jurisdiction was settled, as moved by the managers on the part of the House. Therefore, as the case now stands, unless the House authorizes its managers to consent to this postponement, or in some other way gives its consent, the trial must proceed on the 6th of July next.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the Senate take the absolute responsibility of the postponement of this trial; it belongs to the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment to settle that question, and then the House will acquiesce. There is no occasion whatever for the House to be brought in to share the responsibility of a postponement of the trial.

Mr. LORD. The gentleman must remember that the defendant, on the one hand, appears by his counsel, and the House, on the other hand, appears by its managers.

The managers on the part of the House and the counsel of the defendant have the right to make motions there. It no more belongs to the Senate to settle this question of itself, without hearing counsel——

Mr. RANDALL. Why not?

Mr. LORD. I will explain, if the gentleman will hear me. It no more belongs to the Senate to settle this question independently of the motions and arguments of counsel than it belongs to any other tribunal to determine a question of that kind without argument; and it is very evident (we must meet this question and we may as well meet it now) that the Senate having once, on the motion of the managers, since the question of jurisdiction was settled, declined to adjourn, that body of its own motion will not alter that order. Therefore unless the managers are authorized to assent to the adjournment in some form the result will be that the trial will go on in the month of July.

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate, after having declined to agree to an adjournment, wants to throw upon this House the entire responsibility of a postponement.

Mr. LORD. I think that is not a fair inference.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the effect of the gentleman's proposition. I say it respectfully.

Mr. LORD. I do not think the Senate can be charged with that, for this reason: After this second application the managers, having thought of the matter somewhat, unanimously concluded in the light of all the facts presented to them that it would be far better under all the circumstances to assent to this proposition for an adjournment.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Will my colleague allow me to ask him whether the Senate has not the power to postpone this trial without any consent on the part of the managers representing the House?

Mr. LORD. Undoubtedly the Senate, like any other court, has that absolute power. But I say we may as well act in view of the certainty that the Senate, having once upon motion of the House declined to adjourn the trial, will not do so unless the House assents.

Mr. RANDALL. They have absolute power in the matter; let them exercise it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Although this question is a very grave one, it is one very easily determined. This House has presented articles of impeachment; it has selected a board of managers; the case has been properly presented to the Senate sitting as a court to try this defendant. The case rests with that court. The managers are representing the House, and the court has the power, and must take the responsibility, of adjourning the case.

Mr. REAGAN. I must, with some deference, express a doubt about the disposition of a question like this on any partisan ground. I can understand how the Senate, constituted as it is with a majority of republicans and being charged with the trial of a late republican cabinet officer, should feel some degree of hesitancy in taking the responsibility of an adjournment of the trial at this time without some concurrence on the part of the House. So far as I am individually concerned, I feel no disposition to put upon them an unpleasant alternative. If in their judgment and that of the managers the public interests would be best consulted by the adoption of the resolution which has been proposed and by following it with a concurrent resolution to adjourn over until some time in November, I think it is more fair and just to pursue that course. It seems to me better to do this than that the Senate should upon its own motion adjourn the trial; for if that be done, it must be adjourned until the beginning of the next regular session, so that the whole trial would be thrown into that session. It seems to be the desire that the trial should be adjourned until November; and I would suggest an earlier day in November than that indicated in the resolution, though I will not myself propose an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only wish to suggest that if the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment should think proper to postpone this trial to any particular day between this time and the meeting of Congress next December, then, inasmuch as it is generally conceded that the House must be in session for the purpose of being, in form at least, present during the trial, the House would, of course, concur in the adjournment over to that day; so that there could be no possible embarrassment.

Mr. LORD. Does not the gentleman understand that the Senate, upon the motion of the House, represented by its managers, have declined to grant any further adjournment. We may as well meet this question squarely. It is absolutely true that unless the managers are in some way authorized in their discretion to assent to the adjournment the trial will go on.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go on.

Mr. LORD. If it is thought preferable that the trial should go on in July rather than in November let the House say so, and let us meet the question squarely. The Senate certainly will not adjourn the trial without the assent of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make this remark to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LORD.] I apprehend the House has reached the conclusion that this really is a question for the court trying the impeachment to determine; and if a case shall be presented which will justify and render it proper that the trial should be postponed to a future day, if that is the determination of the court, no matter what may be the day fixed between this time and the time of the next regular meeting of Congress, the House would certainly concur in that action and agree to adjourn to the time fixed by the Senate for the resumption of the trial.

Mr. LORD. Why does the responsibility upon this question rest on this court any more than the responsibility for a similar question would rest upon any other court? What difference is there in this regard between the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment and any other court?

I ask the gentleman whether the courts do not pass on this question after hearing parties on both sides?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly this does not differ in its general outline very materially from cases before a court. The House of Representatives, representing the whole people, is one party, while the impeached officer is the other, and the Senate sits as the high court of impeachment. Of course the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment can concur in whatever determination as to continuance shall be reached. That, of course, is clearly possible. And suppose the House, as I assume, is of the opinion this case, unless continued regularly, unless ground be shown to justify continuance in the judgment of the Senate, should go on; then the question would be whether a case strong enough on the part of the defense can be presented to the Senate to justify a continuance. I only make the suggestion with a view to what seems to be the judgment of the House from the opinions already expressed.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope this motion will not prevail. It is evident from the number of witnesses likely to be subpœnaed that this trial is going to be a protracted one. If you postpone it to the 20th of November, as suggested, you will scarcely get a majority of the members here at that time, and the trial cannot commence until there shall be a quorum present.

A MEMBER. Your Sergeant-at-Arms can bring them.

Mr. SINGLETON. The Sergeant-at-Arms can bring them, but he will have a hard time of it, traveling over thirty-seven States to hunt them up, consuming a month perhaps in the accomplishment of this task.

I think I see the drift and tendency of this whole matter. If you postpone to the beginning of the next session or near that time, the whole of that session will be consumed in the trial of the case, and then, this House having taken the initiative in the matter, if the appropriation bills or anything else important in its character cannot be done, or shall fail for want of time, the responsibility will fall on the shoulders of this House. By adopting this resolution we shall have given precedence to this trial, to the exclusion of other legislation claiming our whole time, it may be to the 4th of March, when the session must end.

Let it go on now, that the public business shall not suffer in December for want of proper attention. I do hope this resolution will not be adopted, but that the responsibility will be left with the Senate to take such steps in relation to the matter as it may think proper, having full power to do so. Again, the question will arise after the 4th of March next, in case the trial is not concluded, whether you can prosecute it after that time, whether with the expiration of this Congress the impeachment will not be at an end, even though a decision shall not have been reached. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, that these several points may be examined into.

Mr. REAGAN. In reply to the closing remark of my friend from Mississippi, I simply desire to say this: that in reference to the question he propounded about the adjournment of this Congress suspending or rendering impossible the completion of the Belknap trial there is, as I understand it, no difficulty whatever. It will be remembered that in English and American history there are many instances where like cases have gone over different parliaments and different legislative bodies. So there is no need to indulge in any apprehension on that account.

But what I rose to say is this: I take it, if you consult the private judgment of members of this House, nine out of every ten, and maybe more, believe it is expedient and proper to adjourn over until the 10th of November. The only objection which seems to be interposed is that of throwing upon the Senate the responsibility of taking the initiative. In relation to that point, I have no desire to impose upon anybody any responsibility which I am not willing to take myself. I see no particular advantage to result to us by throwing the responsibility upon the Senate, or any injury to result to us by consenting to take a practical course in reference to this matter. I concede, if the Senate is driven to the necessity of adjourning the case itself, it must go over until the next session. That will put the trial within the short session of Congress, and in that respect be inconvenient. If the adjournment by the Senate shall be to the 10th of November, that trial may be ended by the beginning of the regular session, or very nearly so, and will give the House more time to mature the legislation now up, and it can be perfected at this session, in order to have it ready for the action of the Senate. All our experience teaches us greater time is required for deliberation on measures in a body so large as this than is required in the Senate. Everything concurring, it seems to me it would be right to adopt the resolution presented with an amendment, and I shall move an amendment that the adjournment, if it takes place, shall be to the 10th instead of the 20th of November.

Mr. JENKS. I simply rise for the purpose of asking this House to have the manhood to do its simple constitutional duty, whatever that may be. There is no utility and no manhood in attempting in any particular to forget that duty which is honestly and fairly by the Constitution placed upon our shoulders. The Constitution says that the House of Representatives shall have the whole power of impeachment, shall prosecute all impeachments; and that implies that we, as prosecutors in the exercise of an honest discretion, shall assume all the duties and responsibilities of prosecutors, whatever they may be.

Now, what is the duty of a prosecutor in any criminal court of the land? Will there be a continuance without consulting the prosecutor in reference to it? And will this House say that the Senate has the right or should assume the privilege of directing this continuance without consulting the prosecutor? This case will ultimately and inevitably result in a continuance; and it would be a singular spectacle to bring witnesses here and to hold the session during the whole summer, which would likely be the case, at great expense and with no utility in the world, for the simple reason that the House declines to step up manfully and do what a prosecutor would do in any other case. The ends of justice, and of expediency, and of everything else would be best subserved by permitting that to be done now which must inevitably result at last.

It seems to me that we should accept the facts of the case as they are. If we meet on November 10, even if a quorum of the House be not present, if its officers be present, so that the House may adjourn from day to day, the trial can go on. The Senate will not sit, so far as I can learn from the individual opinions of members, and hear the case through unless the House be in session. The result will be that the public business will be retarded. Why, then, should we not take the position which the Constitution gives us in this prosecution, and thus consult the general interests of the public?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I believe this case has passed entirely from the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives. We stand now before the court of impeachment in the attitude of clients, as my friend from New York has well said. The House has presented articles of impeachment against this officer, and has instructed its managers to prosecute those articles of impeachment before the high court of the Senate. Now, for one, I am utterly opposed to doing anything which looks like a recession on the part of this House. We can do nothing. The matter is entirely under the jurisdiction of the court of impeachment; and I believe that this case can be carried on without the presence of the House at all.

Is it necessary, I would ask the gentleman from New York, that a client should always be present in the prosecution of a case? What more have we to do? We have no more articles of impeachment to get up. We have nothing more to do, unless it be done by a recession or the suggestion of a compromise.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him whether, in his recollection of all the impeachment trials that have occurred, he ever knew a trial to be carried on by the Senate, or trying body, when the impeaching body was not in session?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I do not know that there has been such a case, but I adhere to the position that it is not absolutely necessary for the House to be in session during the whole trial.

I ask what more has the House to do? It has no more articles of impeachment to get up. They are all presented already, and our attorneys are there to prosecute them before the court; and the case is absolutely under the discretion of the Senate sitting as a court, and it is for the Senate to say whether it will postpone or not.

I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] if it has not often been the case in court that a postponement or continuation is made without the consent of the opposing counsel, and merely by an arbitrary rule or by the rules of court? That is often the case in the courts of the country. I contend that the Senate in this case is sitting simply as a court, and that it should sit as a court after the adjournment of the House, and that it is not at all necessary that the House should be present as the clients in the case.

Mr. LORD. Is the gentleman not aware that it has always been the practice in England and in this country for the managers on the part of the House of Commons or the House of Representatives, as the case may be, to confer with the House as the trial proceeds?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I do not remember any case to the contrary of what the gentleman states. But I do not think that in the celebrated case of the trial of Warren Hastings the Commons were present all the time. I do not believe they were. But whether they were or not, I do contend, as a principle which cannot be controverted, that it is not necessary that this House, as clients in the case, should stand at the backs of their managers all the time. The House has done all it can do, and I am in favor of leaving the question of postponement to the discretion of the Senate. Let that court take the responsibility. I for one am in favor of their taking it entirely. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] will withdraw the resolution. If he does not, I hope it will be referred on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. LORD] what will be his position as one of the managers on the part of the House if by protracting this trial in the interest of the defendant the trial shall not be concluded by the Senate on the 4th of March next? I want to know what his position will then be as chairman of the managers on the part of the House?

Mr. LORD. I will answer the gentleman. In the first place, I do not think that the assent to the motion made by the respondent for the continuance of the case would result in any such thing. In the next place, I have no doubt that the Senate could go on with the trial, if necessary, to the day of judgment if the respondent should live so long.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call the previous question on the pending motion.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer a substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think this matter ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, but I have no objection to the substitute being read.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust it will be read for action.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only consent to its being read for information.

The Clerk read the substitute proposed, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the information communicated by the managers with reference to the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, to the House of Representatives, with renewed assurances of confidence in the managers to whom the conduct of the trial has been committed, authorize them to act upon the subject of their communication as to them shall under all the circumstances of the case seem proper.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope it will be voted down.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question, and there were—ayes 77, noes 77.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair votes in the affirmative.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. REAGAN and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 69.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair votes in the affirmative, and the previous question is seconded.

Mr. LORD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays cannot be taken upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the House adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 320) to reduce the number and increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the United States Army;

An act (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado;

An act (S. No. 692) to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress;

An act (S. No. 773) to remove the political disabilities of W. H. Jenifer, late first lieutenant Second Cavalry United States Army; and

An act (S. No. 863) to change the name of the steamship City of Brashear to Lone Star.

JOSEPH C. IRWIN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a report of the Quartermaster-General on the bill (H. R. No. 161) for the relief of Joseph C. Irwin and William Phillips; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BOUNTY AND PRIZE MONEY OF COLORED SOLDIERS, ETC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a report on the collection and payment of bounties and prize-money to colored soldiers and sailors; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, for one week.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken on Mr. LUTTRELL's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 53, noes 94.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BANNING. I move that the House take a recess until Monday at ten o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the House will take a recess until eight o'clock this evening.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill.

The question was taken on Mr. ATKINS's motion; and there were—ayes 84, noes 66.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 59, noes 61.

Mr. PAGE. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that no quorum voted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point that no quorum voted?

Mr. ATKINS. I am surprised that the gentleman from California should make that motion after the courtesy that has been shown to that side of the House.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point; and I will say in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee that he need not be surprised.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point that no quorum voted, and it then becomes the duty of the Chair to order the Clerk to call the roll.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point. We are very anxious to finish this bill to-night.

Mr. BANKS. A quorum is not necessary on this vote.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentlemen on the other side of the House complain of us for not pressing the appropriation bills, and yet here is an objection to proceeding with one of them.

The CHAIRMAN. On reflection, the Chair is satisfied that it is not necessary that a quorum should vote upon a motion that the committee rise. The Chair therefore rules that the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] that the committee now rise is lost.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to offer an amendment to the sixth section of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the portion of the bill now under consideration, together with the pending amendment.

The Clerk read the first paragraph of section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the number of cavalry regiments is hereby reduced to eight, and the number of artillery and infantry regiments to twenty-three. And the Secretary of War, as soon as the requirements of the service will permit, holding in view the least expense on account of transportation, shall cause the reduction to be made by the merging of the enlisted men into other organizations, either of their own or other regiments, by the consolidation into troops, companies, or otherwise, and the assignment of the commissioned officers to duty with the consolidated troops or companies, or with other regiments of their respective arms: Provided, That the officers of the discontinued regiments may be assigned to other regiments of their respective arms, according to their dates of commission, as vacancies may occur, and any officer, on his own application, may be honorably discharged with one year's pay; and sections 1104 and 1108 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed, and hereafter there shall be no distinction in the service on account of color.

The amendment moved by Mr. DURHAM, and pending, was to strike out the word "twenty-three" and insert "twenty" in the first sentence of the section, as the number of artillery and infantry regiments.

The amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. SCHLEICHER was to strike out after the words "the number of cavalry regiments" the words "is hereby reduced to eight," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "shall hereafter be ten."

Mr. ATKINS. I move as a substitute for the first sentence of this section that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The number of cavalry regiments are hereby fixed at eight, and of infantry and artillery at twenty; and the cavalry regiments shall be recruited and kept at their maximum strength as far as practicable and the appropriation will permit; and an efficient force of cavalry shall be employed in the defense of the frontier of Texas.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe all debate on this section has been closed by order of the House.

Mr. MILLS. I move as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The number of cavalry regiments are hereby fixed at eight, and of infantry and artillery at twenty; and the cavalry regiments shall be recruited to one hundred men in each company, and kept at that number; and a sufficient force of cavalry shall be employed in the defense of the Mexican and Indian frontier of Texas.

Mr. MILLS. I wish simply to make a statement——

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon this section has been exhausted.

Mr. MILLS. I simply wish to state the difference between my amendment and the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent of the committee for that purpose.

No objection was made.

Mr. MILLS. The only difference is as to the number of men in each troop of cavalry. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] requires the cavalry regiments to be kept at their maximum, which, by the present law, is fixed at seventy-eight privates to the company. My amendment fixes the number of each company at one hundred.

Mr. RANDALL. The maximum number of a regiment of cavalry is one thousand and eight.

Mr. MILLS. That is for twelve companies; my amendment would make it twelve hundred to the regiment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. MILLS, and upon a division there were—ayes 46, noes 32.

No further count being required, the amendment of Mr. MILLS was declared to be adopted.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now move to strike out the whole of section 6.

Mr. ATKINS. The second paragraph of section 6 has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the second paragraph of the pending section.

The Clerk read as follows:

And there shall not be any new enlistments in the Army until the number of enlisted men shall have been reduced to 22,000, exclusive of Indian scouts and the enlisted force authorized for the office of the Adjutant-General by the act approved March 3, 1875, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "22,000" and inserting "25,000;" so as to make the entire force of the Army 25,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a vote.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to amend by striking out "22,000" and inserting "20,000."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the President is hereby authorized to assemble, from time to time as occasion may require, a board of not less than three nor more than five officers, such board being hereby invested with the powers of a court of inquiry and court-martial, whose duty it shall be to examine the propriety of conduct, capacity, qualifications, and efficiency of any commissioned officer of the Army on the active list, and into the conduct of retired officers who may be reported to the board; and upon such report, if adverse to such officer, after a revision of the proceedings like to that of a court of inquiry or a court-martial, and approved by the President of the United States, the commission of such officer shall be vacated: Provided always, That no officer shall be eligible as a member of said board whose rank or promotion would in any way be affected by its proceedings; and two members at least, if practicable, shall be of higher rank than the officer to be examined; and the members of said board and the recorder shall be sworn to an honest and impartial discharge of their duties.

Mr. HURLBUT. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what is meant by this phrase in the section just read: "who may be reported to the board;" referring to the officers to be examined by the board created by this section? Who is to report them? Does it mean any casual mention that somebody may think proper to send up to the board? I have never heard of officers being sent before a board of inquiry, except upon superior authority. This thing is altogether too vague and general.

Mr. RANDALL. The object of this section is——

Mr. HURLBUT. I understand the object of the section perfectly.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the same in that respect as the present law.

Mr. HURLBUT. That is not the law now.

Mr. RANDALL. The same purpose is intended.

Mr. HURLBUT. The present law is, "such officers as may be sent by the President or the Secretary of War."

Mr. RANDALL. By the consent of the gentleman in charge of the bill, I would like to have the section amended so as to say, "the President is hereby authorized and directed to assemble," &c. I can see also that the manner in which these officers shall be sent before the board may be made more plain.

Mr. HURLBUT. I propose to test this question by raising the point of order on this section that it is not germane to the bill, has nothing to do with the matter of appropriations, and is manifestly not in the line of retrenchment and economy.

Mr. RANDALL. O, yes; the proposition is to vacate the commissions of unworthy officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that after the gentleman has discussed the question the point of order comes too late.

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir; I merely asked a question. No motion had been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it is too late for the gentleman to raise the point of order.

Mr. HURLBUT. I raise the point of order that the proposition is not germane to the bill and does not come within the rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman discussed the subject before raising the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the Chair is not disposed to rule that the gentleman from Illinois is too late in making the point of order. The point was embraced in the short statemen the was making by way of inquiry to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The ruling of the Chair is not in conformity with the practice of the Committee of the Whole of this House. Under that practice, if a gentleman debates a proposition he may not afterward raise a point of order upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman was debating the subject at all. He merely submitted an inquiry as to the object and purpose of the section.

Mr. HOLMAN. That has always been held to be debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the information elicited by the gentleman's inquiry he makes the point of order, which the Chair thinks is in time.

Mr. RANDALL. The object of the provision is to reduce the number of commissioned officers in the Army, and that will be the result. I have no objection to a change, such as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, in the manner of having these officers brought before the board.

Mr. HURLBUT. I think I will stand on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not disposed to sustain the point of order as made by the gentleman from Illinois. It does not appear clear to the Chair that this provision is not in the interest of retrenchment or economy; on the contrary, the proposition is for the retirement of certain officers of the Army by the vacation of their commissions. The Chair does not sustain the point of order.

Mr. HURLBUT. I cannot argue with the Chair of course.

Mr. BANKS. I wish to inquire whether a mere appearance of economy is enough to justify a change in the laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not contenting himself with the mere appearance. The design of the provision to which the gentleman from Illinois objects is to provide for a board of examination which is to assemble for the purpose of vacating the commissions of certain officers of the United States Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by inserting after the word "board" in the ninth line the words "by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HURLBUT. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that it had better read "by order of the President." He is the proper commanding officer, not the Secretary of War.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I modify my amendment so as to insert "by order of the President or Secretary of War." I think the Secretary of War ought to be added. He is, to be sure, the clerk of the President for the purposes of war affairs; but it seems to me he should be authorized to act independently of the President in a matter like this.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by inserting after the word "authorized" in the first line of the section the words "and directed." This relieves the President of the responsibility.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the appointments to the grade of second lieutenant in the Army shall be confined to the graduates of the Military Academy and the non-commissioned officers of the Army.

Mr. HURLBUT. On this section I make the point of order that it is an alteration of existing law and bears no evidence on its face or elsewhere of economy. I am opposed to the proposition. I do not think it right to limit the appointments in the regular Army to the graduates of West Point and to non-commissioned officers of the regular Army. I think that officers who have had experience in the volunteer service and others who may from time to time graduate at various military schools, if they show ability and character entitling them to the positions, should not be prohibited from receiving appointments at the hands of the President. Therefore I make the point of order so that the law may stand exactly as it is.

Mr. RANDALL. The object of the section is to restrict the power of appointment. It is well known that we have now more than two thousand commissioned officers in the Army; and the authority exists to appoint them from civil life as vacancies occur. Our desire was to reduce the number of commissioned officers.

Mr. HURLBUT. But you do not do it.

Mr. RANDALL. It has that effect.

Mr. HURLBUT. Not at all.

Mr. RANDALL. If we limit the number from which officers can be selected, the effect is a reduction.

Mr. BANNING. That this provision is in the interest of economy I think my friend from Illinois will admit when he learns that the proposition is to take non-commissioned officers, to whom we are now paying salaries, and make commissioned officers of them. Certainly there is less expense in this way than if we take citizens to whom the Government is not paying salaries.

Mr. HURLBUT. But when you promote a non-commissioned officer do you not put another man in his place?

Mr. BANNING. But we take him from the Army which we are already paying; and we do not increase the Army until we have recruited it again. So that the provision is clearly in the interest of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that this eighth section certainly proposes a change in existing law, and in the judgment of the Chair its effect is not such as will warrant the Chair in overruling the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois. But as this is an important section the Chair prefers to submit the question to the Committee of the Whole for its determination.

Mr. HURLBUT. There is only one way in which that can be done, and that is by taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair expected and what he indicated to the committee.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not propose to take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is forced to decide that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. As a matter of parliamentary law the Chair may put such a question to the House. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts whether that is not so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to submit to the committee or the House for its determination the question thus raised.

Mr. BANKS. I should like to say a word on the question of order, if not too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BANKS. This is a proposition to prohibit the appointment of a man from civil life to an office in the Army, and that is all there is in it. Now, it is absurd to say that law can be changed because it is a proposition to reduce the expenses of the Government. You deprive the President of the power to appoint a man who has been in the Army of the United States to a commission in the regular Army. That is all there is of it. Now, can gentlemen on the other side say that change in the law is admissible as a parliamentary question because it is a matter of economy?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is sustained in its own opinion by the gentleman from Massachusetts, but prefers to submit the question to the committee for its determination. The Chair hopes he will be relieved from the necessity of passing upon the point of order by the committee determining the question for itself.

Mr. KELLEY. There seems to be no one who wishes to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ATKINS. And therefore I cannot see the slightest delicacy in the Chair passing upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. There can be no question in the mind of any one, and the Chair is undoubtedly correct in his ruling.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, purchase, equipment, and repair of electric field-telegraphs and signal equipments, $12,500.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend in line 18 by striking out "12" and inserting "10."

Mr. FORT. I do not know the object of the gentleman in reducing this appropriation. It does seem to me that the Signal Service is one of great usefulness.

Mr. RANDALL. That is all they ask for that branch of the service.

Mr. FORT. I supposed they asked for what is reported in the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. The Signal Service is provided for in a different part of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move in line 19 to insert the following:

And hereafter the number of enlisted men in said service shall not exceed 300, and shall receive the pay and allowance of engineer soldiers of similar grades.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to say that, as I understand it, the amendment proposed reduces the number of enlisted men in the Signal Service from four hundred and fifty to three hundred. I believe I am right.

Mr. RANDALL. How much do you say it is?

Mr. FOSTER. From four hundred and fifty, the present number, down to three hundred.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. This is done against the views and judgment of the Signal Corps. If it is done, the value of that service to the country will be lessened. I deem it proper to say this much, in order to have the House understand it, that this is a proposition to reduce the efficiency and value of that service.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw the latter portion of the amendment—the latter clause in regard to pay and allowance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment as it has been modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 19 add the following:
And hereafter the number of enlisted men in said service shall not exceed three hundred.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, this has grown to be a very extensive department of the Government. The cost of it is approaching millions of dollars. It is paid under various Departments and from various sources. It is paid from direct appropriations. It is paid from the Pay Department of the Army. It is paid from the Subsistence Department. It is paid, in addition, large sums of money in the sundry civil appropriation bill. There are one hundred and forty-one stations. Upon consultation we were advised twenty-three of those stations could be done away with, reducing the number to about one hundred and eighteen. We deem two soldiers bearing the rank and pay of sergeants are sufficient at each of these stations. Now at many of the stations they run up from one to seven, which we think excessive. This number would give two persons at these one hundred and eighteen stations and leave sixty-odd men besides. Some might require two; some, as I said before, require only one.

Mr. HANCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question as to the stations he refers to, whether he includes the military telegraphs in the State of Texas?

Mr. RANDALL. I include all the stations. They are one hundred and forty-one in number, including the military-telegraph stations in the State of Texas.

Mr. FOSTER. Where would the reduction be made?

Mr. RANDALL. The reduction would be made in the number of clerks employed here, which we are advised is about one hundred.

Mr. FOSTER. My question was in regard to the stations. The gentleman says he proposes to do away with twenty-three of them.

Mr. RANDALL. In a conference with the general having this in charge, he stated that in his judgment twenty-three could be done away with. Of course we leave that to his discretion, and it is understood he will exercise it. But I am alluding just now to the number of one hundred employés here, which we thought to be excessive.

Then we dispense with the school of instruction at Fort Whipple, which is another large expense. And in this way we arrive at the conclusion that three hundred enlisted men are adequate for these one hundred and eighteen stations and for every other purpose. There was paid last year $250,000 to the telegraph companies of the United States alone.

Mr. HURLBUT. That question does not arise on this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not. But I wanted to give full information on the subject. That will come up on the sundry civil bill when we come to reduce that amount. But as regards this matter, we think we are not impairing the efficiency of this Signal Service in reducing the number from four hundred and fifty to three hundred.

Mr. HURLBUT. The Signal Service of the United States as now constituted has one hundred and fifty men, who have the rank and pay and emoluments of first sergeant, and three hundred privates. That is the personnel of the force.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say to the gentleman that we have made the reduction of one hundred and fifty from those receiving the lowest pay. The reduction is $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The force is reduced by one hundred and fifty privates.

Mr. HURLBUT. I cannot undertake to set my individual judgment up against the judgment of the committee in the matter of this reduction. But it appears to me that the reduction proposed here is excessive. And I call the attention of the committee to it more particularly because though this Signal Service is counted as a part of the Army, it is a purely civil service, intended for the benefit of the great mass of the people of the country, giving information of the changes of the wind, and the approach of storms, and the rise or fall of the rivers, its prophecies in regard to which the people in my section of the country are taught to rely upon. And I am not willing, speaking for the people whom I represent, and who believe in the usefulness of this service, to see so rash a reduction, as it seems to me, made at this time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania states that there are one hundred clerks employed in the Bureau here.

Mr. RANDALL. There are only two civilian clerks. The rest are all enlisted men. There are about one hundred men, as I understand, employed by the Bureau here.

Mr. HURLBUT. The work of the Bureau is very large. It may be that there is extravagance in regard to the school of instruction at Fort Whipple. I do not know how that may be. But I know that you cannot take a man and put him on that service without giving him from three to six months' education in the specialty to which his attention is to be devoted. And I have reason to say that I am not willing by my vote, on present information, to say that this force should be cut down; and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] so that the number, instead of three hundred, shall be three hundred and fifty men. This will be a reduction of one hundred.

I offer this amendment after having had a conference with the Chief of the Signal Corps. He told me that it would be impossible to get on with three hundred men, but he might possibly get on with three hundred and fifty, and keep up the posts by reducing the number of sergeants at the different posts. I make this proposition, Mr. Chairman, at the request of that officer, and believing that it will be right and just for us to limit the reduction to one hundred.

We have been asked to protect and care for the Signal Service by the Chambers of Commerce of all the leading cities in the land; my own city, the city of Chicago, the city of Saint Louis, and the cities of the East. The country is deriving more benefits every day from this service, and I think the House should do nothing to cripple it. I have placed in my amendment the number which the chief officer of the Signal Service says himself it would be barely possible for him to get on with. I hope the House will reduce no more than the hundred. And I ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill whether he will not accept this amendment?

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to it.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Chairman, what is the pending question?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee; the amendment to the amendment reducing the number to three hundred and fifty.

Mr. BANKS. I do not think the committee, if it will look into the matter carefully, will make the reduction now proposed.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the original amendment proposed to make the number three hundred, and the amendment to the amendment makes it three hundred and fifty, which latter amendment is accepted by the committee.

Mr. HANCOCK. And that reduces the number one hundred.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the proposed reduction now is one hundred men instead of one hundred and fifty men.

Mr. BANKS. Well, I desire to oppose any reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is in order and will proceed.

Mr. BANKS. The reason that the Signal Corps is attached to the Army is that the meteorological observations from the beginning of the Government have been conducted by the Army. Most of them are made in distant parts of the country where there is no protection except that afforded by the Army posts, and then, as the gentleman from Illinois has said, it is necessary that men shall be trained for this service and retained in it for several years.

Now, if gentlemen on the other side of the House will give me their attention for a moment, the gentlemen connected with the Committee on Appropriations, I want to state the reasons why no reduction should be made at all. The observations which now give the Signal Bureau importance, by which most of the business of the country is conducted at the present time, depend on their making observations in every section of the country. There are observations made for distinct sections of the country; there are reports made every day from the Southeast, the Southwest, and from the Northeast and from the Northwest; and it requires so many men to make reports of the changes in the temperature or the conditions which control the weather.

The object of the department, and what it will ultimately arrive at, is to extend these observations, not limiting them to sections, but bringing them to every town and neighborhood, so that that condition of weather which is now understood is likely to exist in certain sections of the country may be as carefully anticipated and reported for a village and its immediate neighborhood as for a section. Now, if the gentlemen who have charge of this matter reduce the number of men, they not only prevent the extension of these observations, but they cripple the organization required to make observations for sections of the country to which the system now applies. Take, for example, the Southwest and the Southeast, or the Northeast and the Northwest, and if you withdraw one hundred and fifty men from those now engaged in reporting these calculations, you disturb the reports for some one or more of these sections of the country, and it ought not to be done in justice to the business interests of the country. A reduction of the force will not only prevent the Bureau from extending its operations and bringing down its reports to minuter sections of the country, such as towns and villages, but it will cripple its action in regard to the sections of the country to which it now applies. Let us leave the organization as it stands for the sections of the country to which it now applies.

Now, sir, I appreciate the importance of economy and of the reduction of the expenditures of the Government, but there are many ways in which that can be done. The Committee on the Civil Service reported a year ago that one-fourth of the entire taxes of the country were not collected; that one-quarter of the revenues levied by law and that ought to be collected is lost to the Government by the imperfect administration of the Departments. Why should not the gentlemen on the other side of the House go to work on some problem of that kind? Here are four or five hundred million dollars of taxes imposed upon the people every year, and we have reason to believe that one hundred and twenty millions or one hundred and twenty-five millions are lost in the collection. Why should not the gentlemen turn their attention to that subject? Why should they strike down and cripple the service of the Government in this matter which brings anticipations of the weather to every family and every business man in the country? Why should they take such action as to disturb and cripple the action of the very organization upon which these reports are based?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I would simply state in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the officer who has this Bureau in charge says that he can do very well with three hundred and fifty men.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he say that he can get along very well?

Mr. RANDALL. I think he should get along very well with that number of men. I think he can get along with three hundred.

Mr. ATKINS. In regard to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the Committee on Appropriations provide for the better collection of the revenue, I will just say to my distinguished friend that we propose to do it when we change the administration.

Mr. FOSTER. That will not happen very soon.

Mr. ATKINS. It will happen next March.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will let these weather observations stand until he changes the administration. Why does he want to make war upon one hundred men engaged in the innocent occupation under the instruction of the Government of reporting the changes of the temperature so as to give in advance to every business man twenty-four hours' notice of what changes in the weather are likely to take place? I think that might be deferred until the administration shall be changed. What an admission does the gentleman on the other side make when he proposes to let thieves run away with one hundred and twenty or one hundred and twenty-five million dollars of revenue every year until there is a change of administration.

Mr. RANDALL. The only way to stop thieving is to put honest officers in.

Mr. BANKS. What position is that for these gentlemen?

Mr. RANDALL. What have the Committee on Appropriations to do with the collection of the revenue?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I desire to say that I have had several conferences with General Myer, who is at the head of this corps, and he said that with three hundred and fifty men he can get along satisfactorily.

He has told the committee that he did not intend to establish new stations, and that he had all the stations necessary. He said further he could conduct his Bureau with the reductions made by the committee, not only this reduction, but reductions amounting to large sums made in other items for the support of this Bureau. I believe the statement made by him, and he states that three hundred and fifty men will be sufficient for that Bureau.

Mr. BANKS. One word, if the gentleman pleases. Of course I do not know what the Superintendent of the Signal Bureau has said. I venture to say this, however, that he would say, as every other officer of the Government would say and ought to say to Congress, "Whatever you propose to give me I will do the best I can with it to carry on the business of my department."

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I suppose if we made the appropriation he would employ five hundred men or one thousand men.

Mr. BANKS. No officer of the Government would say to Congress, "I will not carry on the business of my Department with such appropriations as you propose to make," for it is our business to make appropriations. I am sure the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] if he will examine this matter more carefully and consider better what General Myer, the Superintendent of the Signal Bureau, has said, will find that it was only to the effect that, in fact, whatever appropriations Congress chooses to make for this purpose, he will execute the law and try to get along with it. But no man will say that one hundred men can be withdrawn from the small force that is now employed in the Signal Service Bureau without restricting the operations of the Bureau for the benefit of the country.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I only know what General Myer has said to the committee himself. After several conferences with him, in which he was asked to make reductions in the amount of appropriations and the number of men employed in the Bureau, he said he could get along satisfactorily and efficiently with three hundred and fifty men, and he also consented to several reductions in the amounts of money to be appropriated for the expenses of that Bureau. For one, in the committee-room I consented to the reduction of this force to three hundred and fifty men, but I refused to assent to a reduction to three hundred men. I preferred rather to see the Bureau abolished entirely than not to give the number of men which he said was the lowest number he could get along with.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. ATKINS, as modified by the amendment of Mr. BANNING, to make the number of enlisted men in the Signal Service Bureau three hundred and fifty; and it was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move that the committee now rise. It is utterly impossible for us to continue much longer in session in this way.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no dispute about the remainder of this bill. We have already wasted several days of this week, and we were given the assurance that we should have an opportunity of passing this bill by Saturday.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would like to be here myself while the consideration of this bill is going on, and I cannot remain here much longer to-day. I believe we will make more rapid progress with the bill by rising now.

The motion that the committee rise was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 30, noes 38.

The Clerk read the following:

Pay Department:

For the pay of the commissioned and non-commissioned officers, privates, military store-keepers, medical store-keepers, musicians, veterinary surgeons, artificers, farriers, saddlers, and wagoners, except as hereinafter enumerated, $9,170,788.50. And after the 1st day of January next there shall be no more than forty paymasters for the Army of the United States, the reduction being made by dropping from the rolls the junior commissions until the maximum of forty is reached; and so much of section 1182 of the Revised Statutes and of the act of March 2, 1875, and the joint resolution of March 3, 1875, as provides for a greater number, is hereby repealed: Provided, That section 1194 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by striking out "$9,170,788.50 and inserting "$9,154,788.54." That reduces the appropriation $16,000.

Mr. RANDALL. That is made necessary by the reduction in the total force of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out these words:

And after the 1st day of January next there shall be no more than forty paymasters for the Army of the United States, the reduction being made by dropping from the rolls the junior commissions until the maximum of forty is reached; and so much of section 1182 of the Revised Statutes and of the act of March 2, 1875, and the joint resolution of March 3, 1875, as provides for a greater number, is hereby repealed: Provided, That section 1194 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

This portion of the paragraph proposes to limit the number of paymasters in the Army to forty. Of course it is not liable to any point of order, because it is a reduction of the number of paymasters now authorized by law. But I desire to state to the House my conviction from examination of the subject that in the scattered condition of our Army that number of paymasters is not sufficient to pay the men at the different isolated posts their pay regularly every two months, as under the law they should be paid.

I beg gentlemen to consider the time which is lost by these paymasters in moving around to our different isolated posts scattered all through the country; the time they must occupy in traveling, which they are compelled to occupy in traveling. They will be compelled in that way to occupy more time than it would take to pay the troops. It is true that during the war we were able to pay a large body of troops concentrated together, where they were assembled by regiments with their pay-rolls all made out, and they were paid off rapidly. It is just as much trouble now for a paymaster to pay off a single company of men at a post as it was then to pay off an entire regiment.

In addition to that, there is to be considered the great distance between our several garrisons and posts in the interior. The time which the paymaster must take to travel from post to post will render it impossible, in my judgment, and as I am informed by the Paymaster-General, for them to regularly and faithfully pay the men in accordance with the law.

Mr. RANDALL. In 1874, I think it was, the Army was reduced from 30,000 to 20,000; yet in 1875 ten paymasters were added to the number in the Army.

Mr. HURLBUT. Certainly, that is correct.

Mr. RANDALL. Now we propose to make a further reduction in the Army. In the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations there was no necessity for that increase in 1875, and therefore we have provided here for reducing the number of paymasters to what it was prior to that time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I beg to say in reply to my friend that the reason why these ten paymasters were added in 1875 was expressly upon the fact brought to the knowledge of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations of this House, that the then existing number of forty paymasters did not secure that punctuality in the payment of these isolated garrisons which the men had a right to expect from their Government.

Mr. RANDALL. There was really no occasion, as a large minority in this House thought at the last session, for any increase at all in the number of paymasters. I do not know, of course, what were the motives of those who by their votes forced that legislation upon the statute-book; but I think this House is perfectly safe in assuming the position that forty paymasters are enough to pay the force we propose to have in the Army, when forty were enough to pay an army of 30,000.

Mr. HURLBUT. Has not the gentleman the report of the Paymaster-General on this subject?

Mr. RANDALL. The Paymaster-General of course resists this reduction just as every body else whom we have come in contact with resists reductions. But he did say to some members of the committee, if I am correctly informed, that he could get along with forty-five paymasters.

Mr. HURLBUT. And therefore you gave him forty!

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; we believed there was no occasion for the appointment of these ten additional paymasters last year.

The amendment of Mr. HURLBUT was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous:
For the pay of seventy-five contract surgeons, $107,700.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "seventy-five" before the words "contract, surgeons." The object of this amendment is to give the Surgeon-General discretion to employ as many contract surgeons as he pleases with the amount of money appropriated.

Mr. HURLBUT. Then you do not limit the number?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; the Surgeon-General may want more than seventy-five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the pay of forty-two paymasters' clerks, $50,400.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by making the appropriation $56,400.

Mr. RANDALL. The object of that is to allow the extra number of paymasters' clerks to continue as long as those ten additional paymasters shall continue in office, that is until the 1st of January next.

Mr. HURLBUT. You have forty-two clerks and fifty paymasters.

Mr. RANDALL. Forty-two paymasters.

Mr. HURLBUT. No; there will be fifty until the 1st of January. Do you intend that in the interim, before the reduction has taken effect, these paymasters shall not have clerks?

Mr. RANDALL. The amendment is not perfected. With the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] I offer it in this modified form:

Add to the paragraph the following:
And ten paymasters' clerks, $6,000, to hold their positions until January 1, 1877.

Mr. HANCOCK. It seems to me impossible for us to get through this bill to-night unless we stay until a very late hour.

Mr. RANDALL. Do let us stay. If you want to go, we have no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK. I would like to do as I please on that subject, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HANCOCK, there were—ayes 16, noes 39.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee refuses to rise.

Mr. HANCOCK. I believe the Chair has decided that a quorum is not required to vote on this motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is equivalent to a motion that the House adjourn, which does not require to be determined by a quorum.

Mr. HANCOCK. A quorum will certainly be required very soon.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. RANDALL, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For postage on letters and packages received and sent by officers of the Army, on public service; cost of telegrams; compensation of citizen witnesses attending upon courts-martial, military commissions, courts of inquiry; traveling expenses of paymasters' clerks, $80,000.

Mr. ATKINS. At the suggestion of the Paymaster-General, I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read the following:

Provided, That the appropriations under the head of Pay Department in this act shall be accounted for by disbursing officers under the title of "pay, &c., of the Army of 1877;" so that the total amount appropriated for that purpose shall not be exceeded.

The object is to simplify the accounts and save clerical labor.

Mr. HURLBUT. The amendment is correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask the gentlemen on the other side to consent that the committee now rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no!

Mr. RANDALL. We want to get this bill through to-night.

Mr. HURLBUT. Well, you cannot do it. There are nine pages remaining. There is no quorum present, and you are at the mercy of any member who chooses to raise that point.

Mr. MORRISON. Gentlemen on the other side will be complaining because we have not passed the appropriation bills.

Mr. HURLBUT. You have been seven months doing this much, and I am willing you shall have an hour or two longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to make a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. HURLBUT. Yes, sir.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, there were—ayes 22, noes 47.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee refuses to rise.

The Clerk read as follows:

Subsistence Department:
For subsistence of regular troops, Indian scouts, and Indian prisoners, $1,948,686.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend so as to make the amount of this appropriation $1,908,686.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. HURLBUT. I make the point that no quorum has voted. At this time in the evening, long after the usual hour for adjournment, I must insist on the point of order.

Mr. BANNING. You ought to have made it this morning.

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir; I never made it before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers to see whether a quorum is present unless a motion to rise is made.

Mr. HURLBUT. I insist on my point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. HURLBUT and Mr. BANNING as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 32.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CARE OF THE HALL.

Mr. BANKS. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE —. No person shall be allowed to enter the room over the Hall of the House when the House is in session. The Clerk of the House is charged with the enforcement of this rule.

Mr. BANKS. This is a unanimous report. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. RANDALL, (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. AINSWORTH: The petition of T. Worthington, relating to the water supply of Camp Dennison, Ohio, in 1861, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of John Edwards, jr., late captain

Third United States Artillery, for restoration to his former rank and position, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DOBBINS: The petition of Sylvanus Murphy, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ELLIS: Memorial of W. B. SPENCER, of Louisiana, for reimbursement of expenses of contest for a seat in the House of Representatives, to the Committee of Elections.

By Mr. HOGE: The petition of Charles Edward Wunderlick, late a consul from Bremen at Charleston, South Carolina, for compensation for cotton seized and sold by United States Army officers, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. REAGAN: Memorial of citizens of Eastern and Northeastern Texas, against the removal of the place of holding the United States courts from Tyler to Dallas, in said State, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RIDDLE: Papers relating to the petition of Terrence Kirby, of Sumner County, Tennessee, for a pension by reason of signal acts of valor in the war of 1812, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 19, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I hold in my hand a petition, addressed to the California delegation, from a very large number of citizens of Los Angeles County, California. This petition is of such character that I think it is intended to be presented to Congress. It refers to the necessity of action upon the Chinese question; and in it the petitioners say: "We ask this as a matter of right, and know no party in the matter. The Chinese curse is blighting the prospects of our youth, retarding the development of our country, and taking from our social being the very essence of its vitality, the manhood of the present and future generations." I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of the American Seamen's Friend Society, of New York, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 3187, to amend title 53 of the Revised Statutes, relating to merchant seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Sophie Leavor, mother of David Leavor, late of Company C, Second Regiment New York Cavalry Volunteers, praying for an amendment of the pension laws so as to extend the time within which application may be made for arrears of pension until July 4, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Martha Vananam, mother of Horace Vananam, late of Company I, First Regiment New York Volunteers, praying for an amendment of the pension laws so as to extend the time within which application may be made for arrears of pension until July 4, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 604) for the relief of James L. High, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was rejected.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 830) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3182) for the relief of Albert Grant, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew D. Worman, of Frederick County, Maryland, praying compensation for certain supplies furnished to the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the claim was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 852) for the relief of Elisha E. Rice, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 579) for the relief of Joseph Kinney, administrator of David Ballentine, of Missouri, instruct me to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. I will state that this is one of the contested cases in committee. The committee were not unanimous in the report. There are a number of cases of the same kind. I submit a written report with this bill, and move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas M. Redd, of Paducah, Kentucky, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by United States troops in 1864, to submit a favorable report thereon, accompanied by a bill. This is not a unanimous report either.

The bill (S. No. 924) for the relief of Thomas M. Redd was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 1808) for the relief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York, have reconsidered it, and adhere to the former report. This bill was rereferred to the Committee on Claims on the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] I ask that it go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3192) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Henry S. Van Carr and Elsie M. Reynolds, administrators of the estate of Rensselaer Reynolds, deceased, and Gordon B. Reynolds, praying for the extension of a patent granted to the decedent on brakes for power-looms, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 925) for the extension of the patent known as Reynold's patented brake for power-looms.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 61) for the relief of John R. Harrington, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 431) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Graham, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 611) relating to the equitable and legal rights of parties in possession of certain lands and improvements thereon in California, and to provide jurisdiction to determine those rights, have instructed me to report the bill adversely. I call the attention of the Senator from California to this bill. Shall it go on the Calendar?

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have it go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST. I should like to inquire of the Chair what is the condition before the Senate of the post-office appropriation bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not yet been returned from the House of Representatives.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAPERTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 926) to establish a post-road in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 927) prescribing the devices and inscriptions upon the coins of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) to authorize the President to appoint commissioners to attend an international conference upon the subject of the relative values of gold and silver; which was read at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That should the government of one or more countries invite a conference or convention to consider the important change which has recently occurred in the relative values of gold and silver, and the adoption of international measures for the removal of embarrassments arising therefrom, the President of the United States is authorized to appoint three properly-qualified persons as commissioners to attend such conference or convention.

Mr. BOGY. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio to change it into "the conference," and not wait upon the other nations.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was thought by those who understood the subject thoroughly that it would be better to await the action of foreign nations. The Department is informed that other nations will move in the matter probably, and it is thought better for us to await the initiative, rather than commence the proceedings. I hope if there is no objection that the resolution will pass at this time. I take it no one will object to its present consideration.

Mr. BOGY. I object.

Mr. MORTON. I think it had better go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will then move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the motion by referring the joint resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. And that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution will be considered as read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Cherry Levy be withdrawn from the files of the Senate on leaving copies of the same.

DISTRICT POLICE FORCE.

Mr. WADLEIGH. By request, I introduce the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be requested to furnish the names of all persons appointed on the police force of the said District (and now serving on said force) since March 2, 1867, with the names of all such persons as have served in the Army and Navy of the United States; also, whether the act of March 2, 1867, has been complied with, and, if not, the reasons for such violation of law.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 7) to provide for the sale or exchange of a certain piece of land in the Wallabout Bay, in the State of New York, to the city of Brooklyn;

A bill (H. R. No. 2867) to amend section 2958 of the Revised Statutes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3486) for the relief of James F. Buckner;

A bill (H. R. No. 3331) to confirm to the city of Chicago, Illinois, the title to certain public grounds;

A bill (H. R. No. 3730) to remove the political disabilities of John D. Simms and Samuel V. Turner, of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 3736) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 124) requesting the President of the United States to negotiate an additional article to the treaty of July 28, 1868, between the United States of America and the Ta-Tsing Empire, (China;) and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 125) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the authorities of the city of Paterson, New Jersey, four pieces of artillery to be used in celebrating July 4, 1876.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 46) granting the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line to the Walla Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company across Fort Walla Walla military reservation, in Washington Territory;

A bill (S. No. 166) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (S. No. 375) for the relief of Maria W. Sanders.

The message further announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN of Indiana, and Mr. CHARLES FOSTER of Ohio managers at the conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 320) to reduce the number and increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado;

A bill (S. No. 692) to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress;

A bill (S. No. 773) to remove the political disabilities of W. H. Jenifer, late first lieutenant Second Cavalry, United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 863) to change the name of the steamship City of Brashear to Lone Star;

A bill (H. R. No. 40) to re-imburse B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, for internal-revenue stamps stolen from the Cambridge (Ohio) post-office;

A bill (H. R. No. 353) to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, defining the jurisdiction of the courts in Washington Territory; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST. I should like to call up the appropriation bill for the post-office service, which has just been returned to the Senate, in order to move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and appoint a committee of conference to confer with the House on the subjects at issue between the two bodies.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House or Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WEST, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. WEST, Mr. HAMLIN, and Mr. DAVIS were appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, pursuant to order legislative and executive business will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative session.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes. I merely desire to take up the bill in order to leave it the unfinished business for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 19, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., and was called to order by its Clerk, Hon. GEORGE M. ADAMS.

The CLERK. The Speaker of the House being absent and the time for which a Speaker pro tempore was appointed having expired, the Clerk, in conformity with the rules and usages of the House, will now ask the House to be in order while the Chaplain proceeds in prayer.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The CLERK. The House is now in session, and unless objection be made it will be held that the first thing in order is the election of a Speaker pro tempore.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Clerk, I offer the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, a Representative from the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was adopted.

The CLERK. The Hon. Speaker pro tempore will take the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (taking the chair.) The House will be in order.

Gentlemen, it would seem to be ungracious if I did not tender to the House my cordial acknowledgments for this renewed and unanimous expression of their confidence. I shall best deserve that confidence by assisting the House to proceed at once to the dispatch of business.

The Clerk will read the Journal of Saturday last.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has appointed Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, Representative in the House from the State of New York, as Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

Mr. MORRISON also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the President of the United States that Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, one of the Representatives of the State of New York, has been appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFAULTING COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution in reference to defaulting collectors of internal revenue.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the following resolution passed the House on the 13th day of March, 1876, to which the Secretary of the Treasury has failed to reply, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to state to this House the actual balance due from collectors of internal revenue, who are not now in office, since the organization of that Bureau; that the names of such defaulting collectors be given with the amount due from each, and the total amount due from all of those who are in default; that he also inform this House of the names of the defaulting creditors who have been sued, with the date of the suit, together with the date of resignation of the defaulting collectors, and the name of the President by whom and the time when appointed:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House why he has not complied with the foregoing resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I object to that, as I understand the information is nearly completed, or was so last week, having required a gread deal of labor.

Mr. SOUTHARD. There is a letter and also a telegram from Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Conant which can be read, and if they are read, I think there will be no further objection to my resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I object to entertaining the question, for if I am correct there is no need of adopting any such resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDEE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill. I think there will be no objection to allowing me to make that motion, as I think we can get through with the Army appropriation bill in half an hour, or an hour at the furthest.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will not object to that, as that will give the District of Columbia Committee the floor at two o'clock for the disposal of business of that committee.

Mr. HENDEE. I have no objection, provided we are not precluded from going on with District of Columbia business at two o'clock. I presume if the Army bill occupies till two o'clock, the District of Columbia business will then be called without any morning hour and call of States.

Mr. ATKINS. We can finish before two o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There can be no doubt that the District of Columbia Committee has the right absolutely to the floor at two o'clock, and at that hour can take any committee or any member off the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. We will give up the floor at that hour if we are not then through with the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that by unanimous consent the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. POPPLETON. I must object for the reason that there is unfinished business coming over from last Monday which I am very desirous should be disposed of. I refer to the resolution offered by myself under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to suspend the rules is not in order before the morning hour on Monday.

Mr. HOLMAN. With all respect to the Chair, I submit that a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole to consider an appropriation bill is in order, and that the rule in regard to motions to suspend the rules after the morning hour on Monday does not apply in the case of appropriation bills. Undoubtedly a motion to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole may be entertained at any time by a majority of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is undoubtedly true that with reference to appropriation bills a majority may at any time suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is well taken. Rule 104 says:

The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion to suspend the rules for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider an appropriation bill is therefore in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BANKS. I made some remarks on Saturday on the Signal Service, and I ask leave of the House to print some remarks in addition thereto on the origin of the service and the extension of its purposes and objects.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap, and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] will resume the chair.

Mr. BUCKNER. The understanding is that this order will not extend beyond two o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At two o'clock the District of Columbia Committee will be recognized.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope no decision will be made on that point until the occasion arises.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The decision has been so often made in regard to the right to the floor of the District of Columbia Committee at two o'clock on the third Monday of each month that it is not necessary to reserve it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Never on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HENDEE. I understand that the Chair has already given his decision.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the portion of the bill now under consideration, together with the pending amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Subsistence Department:

For subsistence of regular troops, Indian scouts, and Indian prisoners, $1,948,686.

The amendment moved by Mr. ATKINS, and pending, was to strike out "$1,948,686" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,908,686."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Quartermaster's Department:

For the regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, consisting of stoves for heating and cooking; of fuel for officers, enlisted men, guards, hospitals, storehouses, and offices; of forage in kind for the horses, mules, and oxen of the Quartermaster's Department at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field; for the horses of the several regiments of cavalry, the batteries of artillery, and such companies of infantry and scouts as may be mounted, and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; of straw for soldiers' bedding; and of stationery, including blank books for the Quartermaster's Department, certificates for discharged soldiers, blank forms for the Pay and Quartermaster's Departments, and for printing of division and department orders and reports, $3,410,667.93, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, which is hereby made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 87 strike out "$3,410,667.93" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,360,667.93."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the amount now unexpended which is re-appropriated in this section?

Mr. ATKINS. The amount is $189,932.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For purchase of horses for the cavalry and artillery, and for the Indian scouts, and for such infantry as may be mounted, $104,784.89, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1874, which is hereby made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire that the record shall show all along as we proceed precisely the amounts of money actually voted. I therefore ask the gentleman from Tennessee to state in this connection the amount of unexpended balance here transferred to the service of the next fiscal year.

Mr. ATKINS. I will do so. The amount is $645,215.11.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For transportation of the Army, including baggage of the troops, when moving either by land or water; of clothing and camp and garrison equipage from the depots of Philadelphia and Jeffersonville to the several posts and Army depots, and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipments and of subsistence stores from the places of purchase and from the places of delivery, under contract, to such places as the circumstances of the service may require them to be sent; of ordnance, ordnance stores, and small-arms from the founderies and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls and ferriages; the purchase and hire of horses, mules, oxen, and harness, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, and drays, and of ships and other sea-going vessels and boats required for the transportation of supplies and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters; transportation of funds for the pay and other disbursing departments; the expense of sailing public transports on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific; for procuring water at such posts as from their situation require it to be brought from a distance; and for clearing roads and for removing obstructions from roads, harbors, and rivers, to the extent which may be required for the actual operations of the troops in the field, $2,817,804.65, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1874, which is hereby made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 146, before the word "ships," insert the words "hire of;" so that it will read "of hire of ships and other sea-going vessels."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I will state also that the unexpended balance made available in this paragraph is $682,195.35.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For hire of quarters for officers on military duty, hire of quarters for troops, of store-houses for the safe-keeping of military stores, of offices, and of grounds for camp and summer cantonments, and for temporary frontier stations; for the construction of temporary huts and stables; and for repairing public buildings at established posts, $977,865.52, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1874, which is hereby made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1877; and at all posts and stations where there are no public quarters, officers may be furnished with quarters in kind by the Quartermaster's Department as now allowed by regulations: Provided, That the amount paid is not in excess of $12 per room per month.

Mr. EDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on War Claims to offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in as an additional paragraph.

Mr. ATKINS. Perhaps the gentleman had better wait until the pending paragraph is perfected.

Mr. HURLBUT. Before my colleague offers his amendment, I desire to amend the pending paragraph. I would ask my colleague to yield a moment, for my amendment is strictly in advance of his.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] has a right to amend the pending paragraph before an additional paragraph is offered.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move in line 179 to strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen;" so that it will read: "Provided, that the amount paid is not in excess of $15 per room per month."

I offer the amendment, sir, for this reason: I think that as an average of commutation of quarters all over the United States the amount of $15 is a fair and just average, and that $12 is too little. The old plan was arranged by making a difference in behalf of the Pacific slope, and I hope the gentleman will not resist this amendment, because I believe it strictly fair and proper.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to state that the proviso which the gentleman proposes to amend was inserted in the bill at the suggestion of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I want to state further that the honorable chairman of that committee urged the insertion rather earnestly. Our committee, I think, would not have reduced the amount below that proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, except at the request, and insisting indeed, of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is reasonable enough, and for one I am willing to accept it. I do not desire to cut down the pay and allowances of Army officers below the necessities of a decent and genteel living, and for that reason I am willing that the amendment shall be adopted.

Mr. BANNING. I merely want to make a statement to the House of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. The Committee on Military Affairs agreed to reduce the amount to $12 per room per month. That would give a colonel serving away from his command $60 a month for rooms; a lieutenant-colonel, $48 per month; a captain, $36 per month; and a lieutenant, $24 per month. This is more than it was before the war, when it was $9, $12, and $15. Now a colonel who has been serving in Washington since 1869 has received $40,515.12, and of that more than $11,000 has been his commutation of quarters and other commutations received by him by reason of his services here and away from the troops. That is, an officer who was away from his troops and from the field got between one-fourth and one-third more than officers serving in the field.

The reduction here made was agreed upon by the Military Committee. I believe the amount proposed to be allowed is ample and sufficient. It will save a considerable amount of money and give these men, as I have already stated, $60 per month for a colonel, $48 for a lieutenant-colonel, $36 for a captain, and $24 for a lieutenant for their room rent, besides their other commutations for fuel and forage, which makes their pay very ample.

Now, I do not believe that the reduction is too great. I believe that it is just and that it is one of the fairest things in the bill, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. HURLBUT. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in reporting and passing the bill which he introduced himself in relation to the Army, does not propose to reduce this amount to $12 per month.

Mr. BANNING. We said all except in San Francisco. Those were the terms of the bill.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman stand up here and show by figures that from 1869 to 1876 an officer received so much money as he has stated. He has not answered the question. The question is what is a just and reasonable amount to give?

Now, where the United States furnish quarters, as they do in garrisons where the Government already has quarters built, the officer receives no commutation for quarters. It is only when he is detailed somewhere where the Government has no building to which he can be assigned that he is allowed this room rent in place of quarters for himself and family, and I undertake to say that any gentleman will see that the amount of $15 per room per month, making in the case of a colonel $60, is not too much, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I would like to suggest that on the Pacific coast and in the Territories this room rent must be paid in gold and silver coin. I think, therefore, that the amendment should prevail.

The question was taken on Mr. HURLBUT's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 40, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph in line 169 by striking out $977,865.52 and inserting in lieu thereof $877,865.62. It becomes necessary to do that in order to reduce the sum to the rate of $12 per room per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I now offer the following as an additional paragraph to come in after the paragraph just disposed of:

For hire of quarters for officers on military duty; hire of quarters for troops; of store-houses for the safe-keeping of military stores, offices, and of grounds for camps and summer cantonments, and for temporary frontier stations; for the construction of temporary huts and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1871 and prior years of $73,344.82.

For the purchase of horses for the cavalry and artillery, and for Indian scouts, and for such infantry as may be mounted, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1871 and prior years, $28,397.58.

I read from the estimates of the Quartermaster-General's Office:

Hire of quarters for officers on military duty; hire of quarters for troops; of store-houses for the safe-keeping of military stores, offices, and of grounds for camps and summer cantonments, and for temporary frontier stations; for the construction of temporary huts and stables; and for repairing public buildings at established posts, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1871 and prior years of $114,285.74 and a deficiency for the fiscal year 1875 of $7,783.35.

Purchase of horses for the cavalry and artillery, and for Indian scouts, and for such infantry as may be mounted, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1871 and prior years.

It appears from the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury that on the 24th of March, 1876, there was a deficiency for the hire of quarters for officers on military duty and for hire of quarters for troops of the amount stated in the amendment, and there was a similiar deficiency of twenty-eight-odd thousand dollars for the purchase of horses for the cavalry and artillery.

These two items in the estimate of deficiencies were referred to the Committee on War Claims. We sent to the Department for information in reference to these items, and in reply to that inquiry the Department sent us a list of the different persons to whom these claims were due and the amount due each, the whole number of claims amounting to nearly three hundred. The reason for the deficiency I suppose arises from the fact that these claims have been audited and allowed since the close of the fiscal year 1871. The unexpended balances of appropriations being covered in the Treasury, when the claims are allowed there is no money out of which they can be paid, and consequently the estimate comes from the Department in the shape of a deficiency.

The Committee on War Claims thought the proper way to act upon this matter was to move an amendment to the Army appropriation bill, as under the rules the Committee on War Claims have no right to report a deficiency bill. I ask that the letter of the Third Auditor of the Treasury in reference to these claims be read by the Clerk, and I have no doubt it will explain this matter to the satisfaction of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATKINS. For what year is this a deficiency?

Mr. EDEN. For the year 1871, and prior years.

Mr. ATKINS. Why has it not been allowed heretofore?

Mr. EDEN. The claims have just been audited at the Treasury Department, some of them since the estimates were sent in. Before the letter is read, I will state that we do not ask an appropriation of the entire amount. The estimate upon which the committee were called upon to act included about $40,000 of claims not yet allowed, but which it was supposed would be allowed. We have reported only the amount that has been allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. REAGAN. Is there any deficiency since 1871 for this purpose?

Mr. EDEN. This deficiency is for the year 1871, and prior years.

Mr. REAGAN. Is there any such deficiency since that time?

Mr. EDEN. We did not examine that matter, because these particular items were all that were referred to our committee. I now ask the Clerk to read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 14, 1876.

SIR: In response to the indorsement of A. E. Wilson, esq., chief clerk, of the 10th instant, transmitting letter of Hon. JOHN R. EDEN, chairman War Claims Committee, House of Representatives, I have the honor to say that I inclose, as requested by the committee, a statement showing the items which make up the amounts allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury prior to December 3, 1875, to be paid from appropriation (when made) for barracks and quarters and cavalry and artillery horses for 1871 and prior years, and including list of claims against such appropriation which have been since allowed.

The item for barracks and quarters referred to in the communication of the committee, to wit, in Executive Document No. 151, amounting to $114,285.74, included all the claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury payable from such appropriation up to December 3, 1875, amounting, as will be seen by accompanying bill, to $66,296.04. The balance of said amount was asked for to pay claims in process of settlement, some of which had passed this Office and were pending in the Office of the Second Comptroller, and also to pay claims which it was believed would be allowed prior to the passage of the appropriation bill by Congress.

This last class embraced an estimated amount, but it included only claims which appeared to be meritorious and which it was thought would be allowed when reached in order.

The statement submitted also shows that since the report to the Secretary claims have been allowed against said appropriation amounting to $7,048.78, so that the sum of $73,344.82 will be needed to pay claims actually allowed and awaiting settlement in this Office.

The item for cavalry and artillery horses included in said executive document amounted to $27,520.08 and included only claims that had been allowed and were on the 3d day of December, 1875, awaiting an appropriation; but since that time, funds having become available (by partial appropriation by act of May 1, 1876) for the purpose, payments on those claims have been made, so that there now remains unsettled in this Office, of claims included in the above, those only mentioned in the inclosed schedule, amounting to	$22,890 58
But there have been since allowed by the accounting officers claims, as shown by the schedule, amounting to	5,507 00
So that the aggregate sum actually needed to pay claims for cavalry and artillery horses is	28,397 58
Making a summary of the foregoing, we find that there is needed to pay claims reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, December 3, 1875, from appropriations for barracks and quarters	66,296 04
For barracks and quarters subsequent to December 3	7,048 78
Total	73,344 82
To pay claims for cavalry and artillery horses reported to Secretary, December 3, 1875, less amount paid as hereinbefore shown	22,890 58
Claims for cavalry and artillery horses subsequent to December 3, 1875.	5,507 00
Total	28,397 58

And these amounts include only claims actually allowed by the accounting officers, and embrace no estimates of amounts that may be needed to meet allowances to be made.

In reply to the request of the committee that a statement of facts bearing upon the liability of the Government for these claims be made, I can only say that such liability has been determined by the accounting officers of the Treasury, to whom all of the claims were submitted, and that the claims have been carefully examined and the amount called for is undoubtedly due.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. M. GANGEWER,
Acting Auditor.

Hon. B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment offered by Mr. EDEN was then agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For construction and repair of hospitals, $36,494.42, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1874, which is hereby made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$36,494.42" and inserting "$61,494.42."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I will say that the unexpended balance referred to in this paragraph is $13,558.70.

The Clerk read the following:

For purchase and manufacture of clothing and camp and garrison equipage, and for preserving and repacking stock of clothing and camp and garrison equipage and materials on hand at the Philadelphia, Jeffersonville, and other depots of the Quartermaster's Department, $383,221.21, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1874, which is hereby made available for the service of the year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. ATKINS. The unexpended balance referred to in this paragraph is $16,778.79.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, the last section of which was as follows:

SEC. 11. That when any officer travels under orders, and is not furnished transportation by the Quartermaster's Department, or on a conveyance belonging to or chartered by the United States, he shall be allowed eight cents a mile, and no more, for each mile actually traveled under such order, distances to be calculated by the shortest usually traveled route; and so much of section 1273 of the Revised Statutes, or of any act, as conflicts with the provisions of this section, is hereby repealed; and no part of the sum appropriated by this act shall be used for the payment of any officer of the field or line who, by appointment or otherwise, shall be in the performance of any duties of a civil nature in or about any of the Executive Departments of the Government other than for his pay and allowances as an officer of the Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend section 11 by inserting after the words "conveyance belonging to or chartered by the United States" these words:

Or on a land-grant railroad on which the troops and supplies of the United States are entitled to be transported free of charge.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that instead of saying "a land-grant railroad" he say "any railroad." There are some railroads which are not land-grant roads upon which the United States are entitled to have troops and supplies transported free of charge.

Mr. HOLMAN. I accept the suggestion, and will modify my amendment by striking out the words "land grant."

The amendment, as modified, was then adopted.

Mr. BANNING. With the consent of the gentleman having charge of the bill, [Mr. ATKINS,] I desire to move an amendment to the paragraph relating to national military cemeteries.

The paragraph referred to was as follows:

For maintaining and improving national military cemeteries, $125,000; which is hereby re-appropriated from the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $1,000,000 for head-stones for soldiers' graves, under the act approved March 3, 1873, being an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1874.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let the amendment be read; I will reserve any point of order upon it.

Mr. BANNING. I move to add to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall provide for the care and maintenance of the national military cemeteries, and for this purpose shall submit an estimate with his annual estimates to Congress; and section 4876 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

Mr. HURLBUT. Read the section of the Revised Statutes which it is proposed to repeal.

Mr. BANNING. It is as follows:

The Secretary of War shall detail some officer of the Army, not under the rank of major, to visit annually all of the national cemeteries, and to inspect and report to him the condition of the same, and the amount of money necessary to protect them, to sod the graves, gravel and grade the walks and avenues, and to keep the grounds in complete order; and the Secretary shall transmit such report to Congress at the commencement of each session, together with an estimate of the appropriation necessary for that purpose.

All of this matter is under the Quartermaster's Department, and there is no major in that Department to do this duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. This matter is under the control of the Secretary of War?

Mr. BANNING. It is under the control of the Secretary of War, and, if this amendment is adopted, he can detail any major or colonel or captain or lieutenant he may see fit to perform this duty; but under the law as it now stands he must detail a major.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the amendment is all right.

The amendment offered by Mr. BANNING was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I move as an additional section that which I send to the Clerk's desk, to which I suppose there will be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no bonded officer charged with the disbursement of any of the money hereby appropriated shall be subject to the orders or control of any post, division, or department commander so far as relates to the disbursement of such money, and shall be subject to the orders of superior officers in his department, and to the orders of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ATKINS. What is the purpose of that amendment?

Mr. FORT. A bonded officer has to account to his superior officers in the disbursements of money, and ought not to be subject to whatever order a post commander or a division commander or any other commander may think proper to make. He pays out money according to law, and should not be subject to the will of the officer who may happen to be in command at the particular place where he is discharging his duties.

Mr. ATKINS. To whom will he be subject by the amendment?

Mr. FORT. He is subject to all orders in his department. If he is a subsistence officer, he is subject to the orders of the Subsistence Department; if in the Quartermaster's Department, he is subject to the orders of that Department and to the Secretary of the War. I will say that the amendment was sent to me by an experienced officer, who is in the habit of disbursing money.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not like the amendment; and I propose to make a point of order upon it.

Mr. FORT. The point of order comes too late; the amendment has been discussed.

Mr. HURLBUT. I could not make the point before the gentleman yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman from Illinois is hardly precluded from raising the point of order, as there has been no debate except by the gentleman offering the amendment.

Mr. FORT. The amendment cannot be out of order, because it refers to the money appropriated by the bill, and no other.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is out of order simply because it proposes to change existing law, and is not in the interest of economy.

If the House will bear with me, I will state why the proposition ought not to be adopted. It proposes simply to continue and aggravate the worst evil existing to-day in our Army; that is, the organization of staff corps who are independent of the fighting force of the Army.

Mr. BANNING. And with no responsibility to the commanding general.

Mr. HURLBUT. There may be occasions when it is absolutely necessary for the safety of the command that the commanding general should interfere in this matter; and it ought to be left to his discretion.

Mr. RANDALL. It seems to me that the amendment undertakes to adopt Army orders by a legislative enactment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels sufficiently advised to rule upon the point of order. In the judgment of the Chair, the amendment clearly proposes a change in existing law, and it does not propose a reduction of expenses. Hence the Chair does not hesitate to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSTER. I move a pro forma amendment to strike out the last word of the pending paragraph, in order to call attention to a statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on Saturday last. That gentleman complained of the non-action of the Senate on the post-office appropriation bill. I have learned this morning that the bill has been in the possession of the House, and only went to the Senate this morning.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order, that this discussion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is well taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The Committee of the Whole rose informally; and Mr. RANDALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. WEST, Mr. HAMLIN, and Mr. DAVIS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I offer that amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that amendment is read, I wish to say that in my remarks just referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] I said nothing about the time when the post-office appropriation bill went to the Senate. I simply said that the House promptly nonconcurred in the Senate amendments, and, as I thought, on last Monday. I believe that is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir; but you complained further that the Senate had taken no action.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was not aware that the bill had not gone back to the Senate. I presumed it had been promply returned. If not, I suppose it was because the Senate had adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER. I merely wished to correct the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the Senate had adjourned when our action was taken, of course the bill could not go back till the Senate met again.

Mr. FOSTER. While the gentleman was complaining the bill was here in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed that it went back promptly while the Senate was still in session.

The amendment of Mr. MAGINNIS was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the erection of two military posts upon the Yellowstone and Muscle-shell Rivers, as recommended by the Secretary of War and the General and Lieutenant-General of the Army, $200,000: Provided, That the military posts the continued occupation of which will be rendered unnecessary in the opinion of the Secretary of War by the erection of said military posts shall be abandoned as soon as practicable.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The law now authorizes the erection of these posts, and all that is necessary is an appropriation. The provision of the statutes on the subject I have not before me, but I know that these posts were provided for by law upon the personal request of the Lieutenant-General, made before the Committee on Appropriations several years ago. Congress authorized the posts, but their building was delayed until the Yellowstone was proved to be navigable. I now call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. BANNING] to the fact that this amendment is in substance identical with a bill unanimously directed to be reported by his committee, and which has been for some time in the hands of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. THORNBURGH] to be reported to this House.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I ask the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I yield now to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs have some time since unanimously agreed to this appropriation. They agreed to it after looking thoroughly into the subject. Upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War, the General of the Army, and Lieutenant-General Sheridan, we reported it to the Appropriations Committee, and I had hoped the appropriation would have been made earlier in the session. Whether it is too late to be made available this year or not the gentleman from Montana can answer better than I can. I can only say we unanimously agreed to it. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. THORNBURGH] has the bill of the committee and will give the reasons why the committee agreed to it. I think he also has the letters of the Secretary of War and the General of the Army. I hope the appropriation will be made, particularly if it can be made available at once. I understand two expeditions have now reached that country, and there is another yet to go.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask the question whether this proposition does direct the abandonment of those other posts?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, the proviso directs that.

Mr. BANNING. I will answer that in this way——

Mr. RANDALL. The amendment will answer that. Let the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BANNING. I will answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania as fully as I can. My recollection of the testimony of General Sheridan is that he stated as many as six posts could be abandoned by making this appropriation. The amendment does not provide for the abandonment of any particular six posts. I think the committee did not recommend any particular posts should be abandoned. We could not do that, but left it to the General of the Army and the Secretary of War.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the fact that the saving to the Government will not be so much in the abandonment of certain posts as in the immense cost of Army transportation necessary to carry on these expeditions, which will be saved by the establishment of these two new posts.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have some statement as to the amount. Does it require $200,000 to be expended?

Mr. HURLBUT. The gentleman from Tennessee has all the figures.

Mr. RANDALL. Then let us have them.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I move to substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Montana the following, which is the proposition agreed to by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the construction of such military posts or depots at such points as may be selected by the Secretary of War: Provided, That all existing military posts the maintenance of which may be rendered unnecessary by the erection of these new posts shall be abandoned as soon as practicable.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I am satisfied with that proposition, and am willing to withdraw my own in order that the proposition of the Military Committee may be tested.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would not seem to be in order. It does not seem to alter the proposition, but it would not be in order as it is a pending bill before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the gentleman offers this substitute as a bill pending in the House, but simply as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. HOLMAN. The rule of the House is that no bill pending in either House can be offered as an amendment to another bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the substitute is a bill pending in the House. There is no objection under the rule to taking a part of any proposition and offering it as an amendment to another.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood it was the bill of the committee.

Mr. THORNBURGH. No, it is only one section. There is no such bill pending. I was prepared to offer this as a substitute for the bill pending in the House. The Committee on Military Affairs did not propose to report back the bill, but to report this substitute for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Montana accepts it as a substitute instead of his proposition?

Mr. THORNBURGH. Yes, sir; I ask that the letter of Lieutenant-General Sheridan be read, in order that the committee may have information as to the necessity for these two posts being established.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I requested the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to solicit you to detail at length the reasons existing for the establishment of the posts recommended in your annual report and provided for in the inclosed bill. In the press of business while you were here this was overlooked. It would greatly aid in carrying out the recommendations of your report if such a statement could be laid before the committee, as also your estimate of the lowest sum that would be required to carry out your plans in the establishment of these posts.

The threatening news from the northern Sioux gives additional force to your recommendations, and to the belief so long entertained that the only way to control them is in the establishment of depots for troops and supplies in these positions which threaten their haunts and hiding-places, and from which they can be reached in the winter-time without the necessity of such long and dangerous marches as must be made from any of the posts at present occupied.

With high regard, your obedient servant,

MARTIN MAGINNIS.

Lieutenant-General P. H. SHERIDAN,
Chicago, Illinois.

[Indorsement.]

HOUSE MILITARY COMMITTEE.

I hope General Sheridan will answer the within inquiry in his corrected report.

Respectfully, &c.,

H. B. BANNING,
Chairman Military Committee.

A bill to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers.

Whereas Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan and Brigadier-General Alfred H. Terry have, in their reports to the Secretary of War for the year 1875, set forth the great importance and immediate necessity of the construction of military posts at certain points on the Yellowstone River, in the Territory of Montana, and in the military department of Dakota, and such recommendations have been transmitted to Congress with the approval of the Secretary of War: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the construction of such military posts or depots, at such points as may be selected by the Secretary of War.

Lieutenant-General Sheridan's reply to the foregoing communication from the Military Committee House of Representatives.

CHICAGO, February —, 1876.

The necessity for two military posts on the Yellowstone has been apparent to me for two years past, and I have recommended their establishment in my annual reports. So strongly have I been convinced of this necessity that I have, without any expense to the Government, made an examination of the Yellowstone River, and selected the points at which they should be built.

The Indian question in the Black Hills must now be settled by the establishment of the Indians on the Missouri River, and in the accomplishment of this purpose the two points mentioned will have to be located, one at or near the mouth of the Big Horn River, the other at or near the mouth of Tongue River. These posts can be supplied by steamboat up the Yellowstone, and can be constructed of material found in the vicinity of the points selected. I think I can have them built for $100,000 each; or, in other words, I will try to build both for $200,000, instead of $300,000, mentioned in the bill.

The Black Hills country will probably be covered with towns and villages during the next five or six years. Its value will cause the extension of the Northern Pacific Railroad on the south side of the Yellowstone as far as the Gallatin Valley in Montana and will also build another railroad from North Platte station, on the Union Pacific Railroad, to the hills.

I am of the belief that the largest deposits of gold are farther west than where the miners are now working. The headwaters of Wind River are gold-bearing; the Owl Creek Mountains are gold-bearing; the Big Horn Valley is gold-bearing; Powder River is gold-bearing; also Clark's Fork of the Yellowstone. Besides this, the Black Hills have abundance of good timber for the treeless country south of them and west of the Missouri River.

The success of all these interests depends on the establishment of the two posts named.

Military operations have now been commenced against the hostile bands of Sioux Indians by request of the Interior Department; and I consider this appropriation so necessary that I especially request immediate action on it.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Mr. ATKINS. Will my colleague have any objection to inserting in his amendment a provision for the abandonment of those six forts to which he alludes?

Mr. THORNBURGH. They cannot at present be named, for future events may show some one which might be named and placed in the bill it would be necessary to retain. Therefore I hope that provision will not be inserted.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The question of what post shall be abandoned depends largely on the direction in which the Indians shall fall back.

Mr. THORNBURGH. This appropriation is in the line of economy, for the purpose of shortening the lines of transportation over which we have to transport troops, supplies for troops, and supplies for the Indians. There are to-day some half dozen interior posts, away from the river, away from the railroad, in that country where it is necessary for us to keep a continuous supply of munitions of war and supplies for the Indians, that can be and will be abandoned on the establishment of these two posts which can be supplied by river transportation by means of steamboats, and thus save a great expense in the way of transportation to the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not one main motive urging the establishment of these two posts in the Yellowstone region that it will promote the interests of the Northern Pacific Railroad either in its business or the continuation of its construction? Is not that quite a strong motive in favor of the establishment of these two posts?

Mr. THORNBURGH. The establishment of these posts is not in the interest of any railroad. That was a consideration which had nothing to do with the action taken by the Committee on Military Affairs. Their motive was purely and alone to save the Government the expense of transportation to posts remote from rivers and from railroads; to save the immense Army transportation that costs the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars every year. That consideration alone moved the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. The interests of the Northern Pacific Railroad were not taken into account?

Mr. THORNBURGH. Not by the Military Committee, so far as I am aware. At all events, Mr. Chairman, they were not taken into account by me. There will be annually saved to the Government several hundred thousand dollars in transportation alone by the establishment of these posts and the abandonment of the others, which will be abandoned as soon as these are established.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not desired to antagonize this measure, if it is a proper one. Whether it be a measure of economy or not depends altogether upon whether other posts can be abandoned by the Government. That is the question which has to be considered. The Sioux Indians in the vicinity who are gathered at Spotted Tail agency and the other agencies in that vicinity are protesting, as gentlemen are aware, against being removed. General Vandever, who was for several years a member of this House, a gentleman of very high character, has visited the Sioux at those agencies, the Red Cloud, Spotted Tail, and other agencies, and the conversations he had with them have been reported to Congress, as gentlemen are aware. It is quite clear that those Indians are determined not to abandon that portion of the territory which they now occupy, and it would not seem, as far as I have been informed, practicable to abandon any of those posts, unless you can do away with the agencies in that region of country. If they can be abandoned I admit there will be economy in establishing the post on the Upper Missouri River.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The Missouri River posts can be abandoned.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will not give any material relief. There must be a relief resulting from the abandonment of the posts around which the great body of the Sioux have been gathered in order to make this a measure of economy; and I am very apprehensive that after the expenditure of this large sum of money it may be found from the requirements of the Indian service or from some other cause that these posts are of little importance.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think I can in a few minutes demonstrate to the gentleman from Indiana that these posts should be established for purely military reasons. I agree fully with all the gentleman from Indiana says about the Sioux at the agencies he has spoken about. But the gentleman must understand that there is a band of northern Sioux under Sitting Bull who have never made any treaties with the Government. They occupy a country on the Yellowstone which is covered from the East by the Bad Lands, so that it is very difficult to make expeditions there from that direction. General Terry, as the gentleman will see from the public prints, is now endeavoring to penetrate the Bad Lands to reach the Indians from that direction. On the other hand, it is very difficult to make an expedition from the south, as General Crook tried to do last winter. And it is equally distant from Montana. The object, then, of these posts is to establish depots right in the heart of that hostile country by which these hostile Indians can be reached, and the supplies can be put in there by water at greatly less cost than at present, and from which the Indians can be reached without the long, hazardous, and expensive marches now required to be made.

The gentleman from Indiana is aware that we have now three small armies moving on these points, designed to be occupied by these very same posts. Those expeditions are accompanied by immense wagon-trains, and by mule-trains carrying provisions.

Mr. BANNING. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANNING. Are these expeditions now moving with the expectation of getting this appropriation, and making their winter quarters there?

Mr. MAGINNIS. They started out with that expectation, and this amount asked for would have been placed in the regular estimates but for the fact that the Army officers desired that the appropriation should be made in advance of the regular appropriations, and asked the Committee on Military Affairs to report an appropriation in a separate bill, which should have passed long before this. The columns all marched with the anticipation of favorable action by Congress.

Every officer of the Army connected with military operations in that country concurs in the necessity of these ports, as bases from which to conduct successful operations against the Indians. They can be supplied there easily and cheaply by the Yellowstone River, which proves to be a fine navigable stream. And gentlemen must see at a glance the great cost of supplying expeditions which must make long marches by wagon and pack trains. Besides that, the length of march greatly jeopardizes the success of such expeditions, and every failure makes the Indians more confident and hostile. It is folly to maintain an army unless you are willing to permit its officers to take the military means which are necessary to success. Gentlemen may, without meaning it, thwart the efforts of our soldiers and bring defeat and disaster on them; but I warn them that the cost of that will be great to this Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. These northern Sioux to whom the gentleman from Montana refers cannot be well gathered around these military posts on reservations.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The authorities do not want to gather them there. The gentleman must not confound the hostile with the treaty Sioux.

Mr. HOLMAN. The tendency of the northern Sioux is to drift down to their kindred at other posts.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The tendency is for the dissatisfied agency Sioux to go to the strongholds of the hostile bands.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, yes, in the conflicts of the last season that was their tendency.

Mr. STEELE. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana I desire to say that he is entirely wrong as to the tendency of the northern Sioux. So far from it being the tendency of the northern Sioux to go down to their kindred upon the reservation and remain there in peace, the fact is that those Indians who go down to the reservation remain long enough to be fed and perhaps clothed and then leave to murder and plunder our settlers, while the agency Sioux, after remaining at the agencies all winter and being fed and cared for, are to a large extent ready in the spring to leave the agencies and join these northern Sioux in their murdering and plundering raids upon the unfortunate frontier settlers. So that in the present condition of affairs the Government feeds during the winter the people it is called upon to fight during the summer.

The building of these two posts upon the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers will be a great aid to military operations against the northern Sioux. It is now practically impossible for any military expedition to reach them in any reasonable time. General Gibbon, going from Montana, has to travel hundreds of miles to reach the northern Sioux country, carrying his supplies with him by wagon trains. General Terry, moving from the east, has to carry his whole supplies with him hundreds of miles over the Bad Lands. And so with General Crook moving from Fort Laramie, he also has to carry his supplies with him by wagon and pack trains; and the distance traveled by these military expeditions gives the Indians sufficient notice, so that they are enabled to avoid any punishment and escape entirely from the military arm of the Government.

Now if these posts are located there in the heart of the Indian country right where these tribes pass back and forth when going out upon their hunting expeditions or to commit depredations, it will be a very great measure of economy as far as the control of the Indians is concerned, and a very great protection to the entire region of country where they roam. If the base of supplies were near the Indians the troops could move out rapidly and strike and punish these northern Sioux who are constantly desolating our frontier. And we should then have the satisfaction of knowing that the Government was not feeding and caring for Indians at the Sioux agencies during the winter who could go out during the summer murdering and plundering our citizens without fear of punishment of any kind. This appropriation looks to the protection of the people upon the Sioux frontier, and to enabling the Government to compel peace and good order by the Sioux Indians, who by treaty promise peace and in fact are constantly committing outrages and depredations upon our people.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment be closed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. THORNBURGH's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 63, noes 75; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand tellers on the amendment; but, before the vote is taken, I suggest that the appropriation be put at $150,000.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I will state that $300,000 is asked for; and General Sheridan says that he will make the men build it himself, and that it will need every dollar proposed to be appropriated.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. THORNBURGH and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 78, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not call for a further vote on the amendment, but I shall ask for a vote on it in the House.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, and with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. ATKINS. I call the previous question on the bill and the amendments.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; I cannot.

Mr. RANDALL. We want to pass this bill before the District business comes up.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that all the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole be agreed to, except the one upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] indicated his purpose to call for a vote in the House.

There was no objection, and the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were severally agreed to, with the exception of the amendment offered by Mr. THORNBURGH.

The Clerk read the amendment offered by Mr. THORNBURGH and adopted by the committee, as follows:

Add to section 11, as follows:

That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the construction of such military posts or depots at such points as may be selected by the Secretary of War: Provided, That all existing military posts the maintenance of which may be rendered unnecessary by the erection of these new posts shall be abandoned as soon as practicable.

The question was put upon the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 89, noes 56.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being on a division—ayes 33, noes 101.

Mr. BANKS. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order, the main question having been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 99, not voting 94; as follows;

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banning, Blair, Bland, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cannon, Cason, Cook, Crounse, Culberson, Danford, Denison, Dunnell, Eames, Ely, Fort, Foster, Frye, Glover, Goode, Goodin, Hancock, Haralson, Harrison, Hartridge, Hatcher, Haymond, Hendee, Henderson, Henkle, Hoar, Hoge, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kehr, Kelley, Ketcham, Kimball, George M. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Whiting, Wigginton, Willard, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, and Willis—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Bagby, Banks, Beebe, Blackburn, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Cochrane, Cutler, Davis, De Bolt, Dibrell, Douglas, Durand, Durham, Eden, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Gunter, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, Hartzell, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, House, Hunton, Jenks, Frank Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Lamar, Franklin Landers, Lawrence, Le Moyne, Lynde, L. A. Mackey, Maish, Meade, Morgan, Morrison, Mutchler, Neal, O'Brien, Phelps, John F. Philips, Piper, Poppleton, Randall, Rea, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Savage, Sheakley, Singleton, William E. Smith, Southard, Sparks, Springer, Stenger, Tarbox, Thompson, Turney, Robert B. Vance, Walling, Walsh, Ward, Warren, Erastus Wells, Wike, James Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, James Wilson, Yeates, and Young—99.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Bass, Bell, Blaine, Bliss, Bradley, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Caswell, Clymer, Collins, Conger, Cowan, Cox, Crapo, Darrall, Davy, Dobbins, Egbert, Ellis, Evans, Freeman, Frost, Fuller, Garfield, Gause, Gibson, Hale, Robert Hamilton, John T. Harris, Hathorn, Hays, Abram S. Hewitt, Hooker, Hunter, Hurd, King, Knott, Lapham, Lewis, Magoon, MacDougall, Milliken, Money, Monroe, Nash, New, Norton, Odell, Packer, Plaisted, Platt, Powell, Pratt, Purman, James B. Reilly, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Scales, Schumaker, Seelye, Siemons, A. Herr Smith, Spencer, Stevenson, Stowell, Swann, Thomas, Martin I. Townsend, Tucker, John L. Vance, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Whithorne, Andrew Williams, Alpheus S. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Woodworth—94.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BOONE. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. BROWN, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. DURAND. My colleagues, Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS and Mr. CONGER, are absent by order of the House.

Mr. GUNTER. My colleague, Mr. GAUSE, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am requested by Mr. SPENCER, of Louisiana, to say that he will not be here to-day on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. CUTLER. My colleague, Mr. ROSS, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. WILLARD. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. BRADLEY, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. VAN VORHES. My colleague, Mr. VANCE, is absent by order of the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CLYMER; if he were present I should vote "ay."

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I am paired with Mr. EVANS, of Indiana; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This being the third Monday of the month, and the hour of two o'clock having arrived, the regular order under the rule is the consideration of business reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. LORD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment, to submit a request to the House which I think will take no time.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will yield for that purpose.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. LORD. The managers of the impeachment have reported to the Senate that the House has taken no action upon the question of continuance, and therefore they must leave the question with the court. The managers desire to say to the House that they still entertain the opinions announced on Saturday; but as they find they were mistaken as to the unanimity of the desire of the House not to have the impeachment trial interfere with the appropriation bills and the other pressing business of the Congress, they therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the resolution introduced by them, preferring to leave the House, of which they are but the agents, to act independent of any resolution introduced by the managers. And as the Senate will probably definitely settle the question, it is desirable that the record be disencumbered of the previous question now ordered.

There being no objection, the resolution was withdrawn.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the House now concur in the request of the Senate for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the postal service, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

INVESTIGATION BY NAVAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. MILLS. I submit to the House the responses of the Secretary of the Navy to resolutions making inquiry on the part of the Naval Committee, and ask that they be printed in the appendix to the testimony taken by that committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am directed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back to the House, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue; also, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) providing for a joint committee to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and to move that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill and joint resolution just referred from the Committee for the District of Columbia. Pending that motion, I also move that all debate upon said bill and joint resolution in Committee of the Whole be limited to one hour.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to, and the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SAYLER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue and the joint resolution providing for a joint committee to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; upon which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] is entitled to the floor.

REPAVEMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is known perhaps to the House that the Senate some time since passed an act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue, which was referred in this House to the Committee for the District of Columbia. In order to obviate any constitutional objection that might grow out of the introduction of a bill of this character in the Senate, it was thought best, out of abundant caution, that the House should originate the bill on this subject, on the ground that it appropriates money to be derived from property-holders on Pennsylvania avenue to the repavement of that street; and it has been thought by some that there might be a constitutional objection on the ground that the Senate cannot originate a revenue bill.

At a proper time, therefore, I shall ask that the bill from the Senate on this subject be laid on the table. The bill to which I now call the attention of the House corresponds in all its important features with the bill passed by the Senate, so far as regards the mode of repaving the street and the proportion of expense to be borne respectively by individual property-holders, by the District, and by the General Government. The amendments made by the House committee do not interfere with the general features of the bill from the Senate. I make this explanation in order that the House may understand why a new bill is presented here.

I desire to explain briefly the provisions of this bill. It provides in the first place for the appointment of three commissioners—two Army officers, and one civilian, the present Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Clark. These commissioners are to determine the character of the pavement, and are to have charge of the appropriation of money for the purpose of improving this street.

According to my calculation the total cost of this pavement will be from $250,000 to $260,000. This estimate is upon the basis of $4 per superficial square yard. Of this amount the Government of the United States will pay $125,000; the property-holders, somewhere in the neighborhood of $43,000; and the District of Columbia by general taxation about $92,000.

The Senate bill fixed $4.60 per superficial square yard as the ultimate limit of the expense. We have reduced that limit to $4, because from the evidence before us we have very little doubt that an excellent pavement can be laid down at this figure or even less. I believe the bids will be at a much lower figure, and yet secure us a pavement which will be satisfactory to the country.

The bill provides that the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company shall pave inside their tracks and for two feet on each side of the track; that the cost of that paving shall be paid by the railroad company. It provides further that the Government of the United States shall pave up to the line where the railroad begins to pave; that it shall pay for the pavement fronting the Botanical Garden and the reservations belonging to the Government. It is further provided that the Government (and this is also the provision of the Senate bill) shall pay one-half the expense of paving the street intersections, and the District of Columbia one-half; that the private property-owners shall pay one-third of the expense of paving on their frontage, the District of Columbia one-third, and the Government of the United States one-third.

Perhaps the House may desire to hear some reasons for this provision. It grows out of the fact that in 1871 the private parties owning property on Pennsylvania avenue from the Capitol gate to the Treasury building paid $19.55 per front foot for the present pavement, which is absolutely in a state of decay and destruction; while between the Treasury Department and Georgetown in 1872 a similar pavement was laid at an expense to the property-holders of only $4.40. During the last year that pavement has been taken up and a new concrete pavement laid at the expense of the District of Columbia, the property-holders paying nothing. Hence it has been provided in the Senate bill (and we agree with the Senate on this point) that these property-holders shall pay only one-third of the cost, which will be about $6.70 per front foot; that the Government shall pay one-third, and that the District of Columbia by general taxation shall pay the remaining third.

With this explanation of the provisions of the bill, I send to the Clerk's desk several amendments agreed to by the committee. Before they are read I will state that this bill as introduced by myself provided for a commission to consist of two Army officers and three private citizens—Mr. Cluss, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Clark. The committee have, however, directed me to move in one of these amendments to strike out the names of two of these citizens, leaving that of Mr. Clark, so that the commission shall consist of General Gillmore, General Wright, and Mr. Clark, the architect of the Capitol.

The first amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In the sixth line of section 1 strike out Adolph Cluss and Charles Mason.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In the second line of section 8, after the words "District of Columbia," insert "under the direction of said paving commission."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In the fourth line of section 8, after the word "down," insert the following:
And it shall be the duty of the board of water commissioners and of the Washington Gas-light Company, under the direction of said paving commission, to take up, lay, and replace all gas-pipes, water-mains, and connections on said Pennsylvania avenue, at such time and places as said paving commission may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add as a new section the following:
SEC. 9. The sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not heretofore appropriated, and a like amount is directed to be paid by the District of Columbia commissioners to the said paving commission, to defray the necessary expenses of said commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. I desire to offer some amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman report them from the committee?

Mr. NEAL. No, sir; I offer them on my individual responsibility. I move, in the first place, to insert "five" instead of "three," in line 26 of section 2, so as to provide that "the contractors shall keep the said pavement in good order for the term of five years." I will state the effect of this amendment is simply that the contractors shall guarantee this pavement for the term of five instead of three years, as in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. I have an additional amendment. I move in the same section, line 27, to strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and," and to strike out the word "a" and insert in lieu of it "ten;" and in line 28, after the word "as," insert the words "an additional security and;" so it will read:

Provided, That said pavement shall be of the best material, laid in the most substantial manner, and without unnecessary delay, and that a good and sufficient bond to the United States, with sureties to be approved by the commission, shall be exacted, guaranteeing that the terms of any contract or contracts made shall be strictly and faithfully observed, and that the contractor shall keep the said pavement in good repair for the term of five years; and said commission shall retain 10 per cent. of the cost of the work as an additional security and guarantee fund to keep the same in repair for the said term.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move the following amendment, to come in as an additional section:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. Said commission shall also cause so much of I street as lies between Eighth and Tenth streets northwest to be paved at a cost of not more than $2.50 per square yard above the proceeds of the old pavement, the cost thereof to be paid in the manner set forth in the third section for repaving Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. BUCKNER. It seems to me that amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. HOAR. I am entitled to the floor on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Missouri rose to some other point.

Mr. HOAR. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri, chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUCKNER. I understand this amendment applies to that portion of Pennsylvania avenue north——

Mr. HOAR. O, no; just hear my statement. This amendment applies to a little piece of I street between Eighth and Tenth streets. It is a part of I street wholly occupied by private residences, and is one of the worst pieces of pavement in the city, as everybody knows who has had occasion to travel over it. It was paved at the entire expense of the owners some years ago. It is a pavement now almost unfit to pass over in a carriage. This proposition is made at the request of those who live there, quite a number, and provides that the expense shall not exceed $2.50 per square yard and shall be assessed by this commission.

Mr. BUCKNER. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. There are a great many streets here which ought to be repaired now, and a great deal of money might be spent. If we make provision in this bill for the repaving of this portion of I street because it is bad, requests will come up for the repaving of all the other streets in the city at once. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HOAR. This is a simple thing, but important to the persons dwelling on that street. They think, having at their own expense laid this pavement, they ought to be permitted now to have this little piece repaved at their own expense.

Mr. BUCKNER. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HOAR. I demand a division on the amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. I hope not.

Mr. HOAR. I will not press it if the committee having the bill in charge seriously oppose it. I will not press the division.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I move the following, to come in as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. The expense of laying down such service-pipes and sewer connections shall be assessed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia in the manner provided by the fourth section of this act, upon the property in front of which they shall be laid; and the provisions of the fourth and sixth sections of this act in relation to the collection of the assessments for the expenses of said pavement are hereby made applicable to the assessments for the expense of laying down such service-pipes and sewer connections.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed this bill makes simply provision for assessing and collecting the expense of this pavement, but it makes no provision whatever for assessing and collecting the expense of this service-pipe and sewer connections for gas and water. It has been suggested there is some general law upon which it can be done, but it would be very remarkable there should be a general law under which you could not assess and collect the expense of this pavement, and yet at the same time, under which you could assess and collect the expense of this service-pipe and sewer connections. If the gentleman can find such a law, my amendment would be unnecessary, but I have examined the law somewhat carefully since the organization of the old District government, and I can find no authority in the board of commissioners to make any such assessment. If there is such a law, the gentleman can point it out. Inasmuch as this bill makes such special provision in regard to paving, it is remarkable there should be in the general law some power by which similar provisions should be found in reference to this service-pipe and sewer connections.

Mr. BUCKNER. I had prepared some such provision as that, but I was told by a gentleman who was perfectly familiar with the law and practice in this District that there is a general law covering just such cases, and that the District commissioners had the right to assess and collect the expense of such service-pipe and sewer connections upon the property affected thereby.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. If there be any such law, which I have not been able to find, the result of adopting this amendment would be merely that this section would be superfluous, for this amendment which I propose is in perfect harmony with the bill. It authorizes the same persons to assess the expenses, and provides for collecting the amount in the same manner.

Mr. BUCKNER. The tax for the pavement ought to be kept by itself, that for the water connections should be paid by the property-holders.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. In my amendment this is kept by itself, and the amount is assessed upon the property in front of which each connection is formed.

The question being taken on Mr. LEAVENWORTH's amendment, there were ayes 10, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the first section insert the following:

It shall also be the duty of such commission to select and determine the best kind of stone to be used in making the street-crossings across Pennsylvania avenue and the streets and avenues intersecting the same, and across the triangular spaces above mentioned, and to have such street-crossings made of such kind of stone as they or a majority of said commission may agree upon. It shall also be the duty of said commission to select and determine the best kind of stone for paving the sidewalks adjacent to the property of the United States fronting on said avenue, and to have such sidewalks paved with such stone as they or a majority of the said commission may agree upon.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. My object in offering this amendment is to supply a deficiency in the bill by giving the commissioners the discretion of naming the kind of stone to be used in making the crossings. And in relation to the sidewalks, my object is to do away with the old brick sidewalks ajacent to the Government property on the Avenue and to replace them with stone.

Mr. BUCKNER. There are two objections to this amendment. One is that it requires the commissioners to determine what sort of stone should be used in making the crossings. We do not want to encumber this bill with anything of that sort. That is one objection. And then, in regard to the sidewalks, the amendment makes it the duty of the commissioners to determine the best stone for paving the sidewalks adjacent to the property of the United States. That is hardly germane to this bill, and it is not necessary to encumber the bill with any amendment of that sort. As to making the crossings with any particular kind of stone, however desirable that may be, in a certain contingency it would not be necessary at all if the commissioners should decide to adopt the asphalt pavement or any other hard pavement.

Mr. NEAL. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from New York rightly it is wholly and entirely unnecessary. As regards the first point in the amendment the bill as it now comes from the committee provides for the very thing which the gentleman seeks to provide for. Again, the amendment proposed, if adopted by the committee, will add largely to the amount of money that must be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. For the amendment provides that the sidewalks adjacent to the Government property on the Avenue shall be repaved with this stone, which would be entirely unnecessary, and is not provided for in the bill as it now stands. It would be adding unnecessarily to the cost required at the hands of the Government.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I wish simply to say that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] is mistaken. The amendment does not make it obligatory on the commission to decide on any stone. It leaves it entirely with the commission. That is the idea of the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PERMANENT GOVERNMENT FOR THE DISTRICT.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the joint resolution, which is also before the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) providing for a joint committee to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Resolved, &c., That a joint committee, consisting of three members of the House and two members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House and by the presiding officer of the Senate, respectively, is hereby appointed, whose duty it shall be, during the recess of Congress, to prepare a suitable form of government for the District of Columbia and appropriate draughts of statutes to be enacted by Congress for carrying the same into effect, and report the same to the two Houses, respectively, on the first day of the next session thereof. It shall also be the duty of said joint committee to prepare and submit to the next session of this Congress a statement of the proper proportion of the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, or any branch thereof, including interest on the funded debt, which should be borne by said District and the United States, respectively, together with the reasons upon which their conclusions are based. Said committee are authorized to employ such assistance as may be needed to enable them to discharge the duties hereby imposed on said committee; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the necessary expenses of said joint committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. By direction of the committee, I send to the desk an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the third line, after the word "that" to the word "respectively," in the sixth line, inclusive, and insert "a commission consisting of two residents of the District of Columbia and one non-resident thereof, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, and two residents of said District and one non-resident thereof to be selected by the presiding officer of the Senate."

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman explain the effect of that?

Mr. BUCKNER. The effect of this amendment is, instead of a joint committee of the House and the Senate, as in the original bill, to authorize the appointment of six persons, three of whom shall be residents of the District of Columbia and three non-residents, to report to Congress at its next session some form of permanent government for the District of Columbia; and also to determine what proportion of the expenses of the District should be borne by the General Government. The reason of the change is simply that, upon consideration, the committee came to the conclusion that it would be impossible in the coming recess, on account of the political excitement, to get a committee of Congress or any number of them to decide or even to discuss this question as it ought to be so as to make a report to this Congress. There is no more important question, so far as the Government is concerned and this District is concerned, than to have a permanent form of government for the District; and also to have it determined what proportion the Government shall pay of the expenses of this District.

This provision, except as to the character of the commission, is precisely identical, almost word for word, with the provision in the act of 1874, when this present temporary government was established. The act of Congress of 1874 provided that a committee should be appointed to prepare a form of government as well as to determine this other important question. That committee did report to the Senate, but the report fell still-born and nothing has been done. The consequence is that this District is in a very extraordinary condition, with no permanent form of government, and with no understanding in regard to its relations to the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that it may be very proper that there should be on this commission three residents of the District of Columbia, but the other three should be non-residents. Every one knows that the natural feeling of those three from the District would be to lighten the burden upon property here. There should be three that are non-residents, and who may be presumed to act in the interests of the United States Government. I would suggest that the gentleman change the amendment so that three shall be residents of the District of Columbia and the other three non-residents.

Mr. BUCKNER. The amendment provides that.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I think not.

Mr. BUCKNER. I think it does.

Mr. RANDALL. No; it only says that the other three shall be non-residents.

Mr. BUCKNER. We desire that the Government shall be interested as well as the District.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the Government have the same force in this commission as the District.

Mr. HENKLE. The reading of the amendment again will show that it has. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. That makes it four District commissioners to two non-residents.

Mr. BUCKNER. O, no; it does not mean that.

Mr. BLAND. Yes, it says so certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then I was mistaken.

Mr. BLAND. It gives four commissioners for the District and two outside of the District.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest an amendment, that two of the commissioners appointed on the part of the House shall be non-residents of the District, and one a resident of the District, and that of the three appointed on the part of the Senate, two shall be residents of the District, and one a non-resident.

Mr. BUCKNER. We have no objection to that; that is what we designed.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; but you leave the House to appoint two residents and the Senate to appoint two.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is not what the committee intended.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the language does not convey the intention of the committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am willing to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

The amendment offered by Mr. BUCKNER, as modified at the suggestion of Mr. RANDALL, was then agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD. I offer the following amendment to the joint resolution:

Provided, In any report which may be made by said commission, it shall be provided that the right of suffrage shall be given to the people of the District under proper regulations.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make any extended remarks on this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I will raise the point of order before the gentleman proceeds; but I am willing to withhold it until he has submitted his remarks.

Mr. BUCKNER. I hope my friend from Michigan will withdraw that proposition to-day. It will come up next winter when the report of the commission is presented.

Mr. WILLARD. I desire by this amendment to give form to my views on a subject which I consider to be of vital importance. I believe it to be a shame, Mr. Chairman, that in the capital city of a republic which is based upon the principle of self-government that we should repudiate that principle. I believe, sir, that many of the evils which have arisen in this District and which have attracted the attention of the nation have in a large measure been derived from the fact that the government of this District was vested in those who had no personal and immediate interest in it. It is my firm conviction that we should impose the responsibility of directing the affairs of the people of this municipality upon themselves; that the men of property and the men of intelligence in this District, together with the rest of the people, should be made to realize that upon them rests the burden of managing their own affairs, and the sooner they understand that they must be responsible for their own government I believe it will be to their decided advantage. Most assuredly so long as we profess to believe in the principle of self-government it should not be abnegated and denied here in the political metropolis of a great people whose special boast is individual liberty.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman if he proposes by what he has said that none but property-holders should vote, or legislate, or have any voice in this matter?

Mr. WILLARD. No, sir; but the objection that is urged by some to suffrage is that a large class of the population who are without property will take the direction of affairs here. Now, it is true that in almost all the cities of the Union the same trouble to some extent exists. It is often found to be the case that a class of people who perhaps do not give sufficient attention to government, and who are liable to be led by demagogues, do not always give a very proper illustration of the principle of self-government; while at the same time it is true that if all the people, the men of property and the men without property, the men of more intelligence and the men of less intelligence, are made to feel that they are committed to the same destiny, that they are in the same boat, that it is for them to sink or swim, to survive or perish upon the single principle of self-government—I say, when men are made to realize this, I believe the result will be such as to fully justify the cardinal principle upon which our republican institutions are founded—the principle that the people in their sovereign capacity should take care of their own affairs, should feel their own responsibility, should take their own burdens, should support their own schools, should make their own municipal laws and regulations, should build up all their local institutions, and beautify their towns and cities as may to them seem best.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WILLARD. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. If the people of the District of Columbia make their own laws, what becomes of the clause in the Constitution requiring Congress to exercise exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia?

Mr. WILLARD. I refer, when I say their own laws, to their municipal regulations. I do not deny that under the Constitution of the United States the Congress of the United States has exclusive legislation over the District, for that is required by the very words of that instrument, but at the same time I believe that it was the intention of the fathers, and is in accordance with the spirit of our institutions, that the relation of this Congress to the people of the District of Columbia should be the same as that of the Legislature of a State to the different municipalities of the State, and that the District of Columbia, as a municipality, should have the right to elect its own officers, to make its own municipal regulations, and direct its own affairs in every particular, while Congress at the same time is to exercise that supervisory authority over it which the Legislatures of the several States exercise over the municipalities of the States. Under that regulation, I believe that we should establish this new government for the District of Columbia. In this centennial year of the Republic I plead for the principle of self-rule as a right, and that we should not stand before the nations of the Old World here, and right under the shadow of the Capitol, denying to the people the right of self-government.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to say a word or two upon this subject. It is undoubtedly competent for the House, while providing for the appointment of this commission, to give some directions as to the manner in which they shall perform their duty. The single purpose of this amendment, as I understand it, is to direct the commission in framing a form of government for the District of Columbia to incorporate in their system the principle of suffrage.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says very truly that the Constitution provides that Congress shall have exclusive legislative power over the District of Columbia. So the constitution of every State provides that all the legislative power of the State shall be vested in a general assembly or legislature of the State. Yet we know that in all the States, notwithstanding the exclusive legislative power given to the General Assembly or Legislature of the State, city governments are established and police powers are conferred upon them, and the authority to make police and other regulations is vested in city councils. It never has been supposed that that is a violation of the provision of the State constitution which confers all legislative power on the General Assembly of the State. So much for that.

But it does not absolutely follow that if this amendment shall be adopted there shall be any transfer of the legislative power of Congress to any body that may be organized under the plan proposed by this commission. It does undoubtedly contemplate that under any system that shall be established the people of the District shall have the right to elect all officers who are to execute the laws under the District government. To that it seems to me there can be no objection.

As my friend from Michigan [Mr. WILLARD] has said, we ought not in this capital city of the Republic and in this centennial year to say that the principle of suffrage is a failure, that popular government is a failure; we ought not to abandon this cardinal principle of all republican governments. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I had supposed, Mr. Chairman, there was no wiser provision in the Constitution of the United States than that which provided for the existence of a Federal city, a spot in the country where the jurisdiction of the United States should be supreme, which should be occupied by the Government buildings and Government officers, persons from various parts of the country engaged in the public employment; a territory over which Congress should have exclusive legislative power and from which the principle of local self-government should be excluded. That is the Constitution of the United States, adopted by a body many of whom belonged to the Continental Congress, which had been bullied by the citizens of Philadelphia and compelled to adjourn because they would not yield to the popular tumult and excitement in regard to some matter of important public legislation.

Now the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLARD] talks about the centennial year, and about holding out to the nations of the world the principle of self-government and of suffrage. Why, sir, what sort of a figure will he make addressing his oration to the nations of the world and showing in this centennial year the example of giving the right of suffrage to a body of people from whom by the Constitution of the United States all right to make their own laws is expressly forbidden? His speech must be confined to the glories of corporate powers, to police arrangements and such petty arrangements in regard to streets, highways, driving horses, having the snow shoveled from roofs, &c., as do not anywhere fall within the definition of lawmaking.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Police power is not legislative power.

Mr. HOAR. No, police power is not legislative power. Now, the only thing we can do while the Constitution of the United States remains unchanged is to give to the people of this District the power of appointing their own policemen and all petty officers of that kind, and of making their own police regulations; such powers as towns and cities have under the constitutions of States. I maintain that the experience of seventy-five years in governing this District shows that the misgovernment and complaint which have prevailed under every experiment we have tried have grown out of this attempt to confer the power of executing laws upon an entirely different body from that which has the power of making them.

The people of this District are irresponsible. Men who come here as public officers are citizens of their own States at home. Men who come here merely to take up a residence are few in number, and they take up that residence with a full knowledge that they come into a place where, from public policy, the power of self-government must be denied to them. If this District is too large for Federal purposes, then let us cede it back to Maryland in part, as we have already ceded it back in part to the State of Virginia.

In my judgment there is but one feasible method that has been proposed for the government of this District, and that is to have, in regard to each subject of administration, such as schools, a water supply, roads and highways, and the like, separate boards of officers appointed by the President and responsible to the United States, and exercising a power analogous to that of county commissioners in our northern States. Such boards of officers appointed according to subject-matters ought to be appointed by Federal authority.

Then, in regard to this perplexing matter of adjustment of taxation, we ought to authorize these commissioners for their purposes to assess on all the property of the District of Columbia a sum equal to the average rate of taxation on all property, personal and real, which prevails in all well-governed cities of the country. And having got that sum, which is all the people of this District ought to be asked to contribute, the rest should be paid, and will have to be paid, out of the Treasury of the United States.

Now, until that scheme in substance is adopted, we shall have the old complaint, first, of inefficiency, misrule, and an unsewered, ungraded, unpaved, and uncleansed city, such as we had when we came here; or, second, a usurpation of political power in order to make the city decent and habitable, and with such usurpation its accompanying corruption and abuse in regard to the expenditure of money.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate in connection with these two bills was to terminate in one hour, which has now expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that by consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate cannot be extended by consent. The committee may rise and ask additional time of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, let us rise.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The five-minute debate on amendments can go on, I presume.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is only ruling in accordance with the order of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The House did not cut off the five-minute debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that by order of the House, upon request of the chairman for the District of Columbia, all debate was limited to one hour.

Mr. BANKS. All general debate.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the committee rise and report these bills.

Mr. WILLARD. I ask a vote on my amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLARD, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill and joint resolution to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SAYLER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue, and a joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) providing for a joint committee to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and had directed that the same be reported with certain amendments and a recommendation that they be passed as amended.

REPAVEMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, being the bill (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. BUCKNER called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 109, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to have the yeas and nays on this bill.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 15, noes 150; less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. COCHRANE. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted on the passage of the bill, the Chair orders tellers and appoints the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 118, noes 34.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERMANENT GOVERNMENT FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House next proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, being joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) providing for a joint committee to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was read, as follows:

After the word "that," in line 3, strike out the following: "A joint committee, consisting of three members of the House and two members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House and by the presiding officer of the Senate, respectively," and insert the following:

A commission, consisting of two non-residents of the District of Columbia, and one resident thereof to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, and two residents of said District and one non-resident thereof to be selected by the presiding officer of the Senate.

Mr. BUCKNER. I call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the previous question is ordered I want to put on record a statement of the principle which in my view governs the question that has been raised here in regard to the District of Columbia. The question presents itself to me in this broad form: can a power of legislation delegated to Congress in the Constitution be by it delegated to anybody else? To my mind the question answers itself. When the Constitution says that Congress shall have power to collect taxes, I take it for granted that we cannot, by any possible construction, invest anybody else with that power of collecting taxes. We cannot delegate any legislative power.

Now it is provided explicitly in the Constitution that Congress "shall exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" in the District of Columbia. To my mind that ends all controversy. There is no room for sentiment about the principle of personal sovereignty and suffrage. There is no room for philosophy. The law, the Constitution, has settled the question; and in the first step we take toward giving any legislative power whatever in the District of Columbia to anybody we break the very fundamental law that regulates this whole subject.

Mr. WILLARD. Did the fathers so interpret it?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what they provided; and they so provided for a reason which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has hinted at and which will bear further statement. They found themselves without a foot of ground which the Government could call its own. They found themselves trespassers on the courtesy and kindness of States and cities. The old Continental Congress was absolutely a fugitive in the land which it was blessing with its wisdom; driven from Philadelphia by an armed mob that the State would not and the city could not prevent; taking refuge in Baltimore; going back again to Philadelphia; thence to Lancaster; thence to York; thence to Princeton and to Trenton; finally closing its career in New York City. When the fathers came to found a stable National Government, one of the most important things to be provided for—so recognized by Washington especially, who had seen the deadly peril in which Congress would be placed without such a provision—was that there should be no division of absolute sovereignty in regard to the government of the Federal city.

And they went even further, to take absolute jurisdiction generally. They went so far as to arrange that the fee simple of the streets of the Federal city should be exclusively and only in the Government. And so far as I know it is the only city on the globe that owns the fee simple to every foot of the streets in it.

A MEMBER. Who owns it?

Mr. GARFIELD. The Government owns it. We could build a block of buildings all the way from the western foot of our Capitol to the Treasury, filling Pennsylvania avenue from side to side, if we chose to do so, because we own every foot of the ground.

Well, now, with such exclusive and despotic powers placed in our hands for a purpose which the fathers deemed wise, there is left for us no room for sentiment whatever. I voted, I think, for the organization of the government of this District, but I am sure it was not long afterward I became satisfied I had made a mistake when I did so. I became satisfied—and I think my first attention was called to it by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR]—that we could not part with any whit of our power when thus conferred as an exclusive and absolute power relating to all matters of legislation whatever.

Now if you talk about the appointment of police, if you talk about any merely subsidiary regulation, that cannot rise to the dignity of legislation, perhaps that can be delegated, but anything that can be called legislation in reference to the city of Washington and the District of Columbia must be done here. To my mind that is the end of the whole chapter.

We owe to this city of Washington, Mr. Speaker, more of our time, more of our thoughts, and we ought to make them a more coherent body of laws than they now have. Let us order a committee to go over this whole subject and enable us to do some worthy work of legislation.

In this same connection I wish to say precisely this kind of committee to prepare legislation will, in my judgment, before many years be found to be necessary in a wider way and in our own legislation. John Stuart Mill has said a very wise, a very remarkably wise thing in his autobiography which he left to be published after his death. He said the time is coming——

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me a moment longer. He said that the time is coming, and that soon, when every great free government must have a legislative commission as part of its constitutional arrangement; that a great body like this of ours is not fit—is radically unfit—to make laws, but is very fit to tell what laws shall be made; that a body like this could direct the kind of statute it would have made on any such subject and then a legislative commission of not a large number of men, but the highest political minds, could put into the proper form of law such an act as the aspiration of Congress expresses in its resolution; and when that law thus fully and completely expressed was laid before Congress, and Congress should ratify it and pass it, it should become the law. I believe such a time will come, when such a commission will be required by the vast legislation of Congress. Let us try it in reference to this District.

Mr. RANDALL. I remember when the law was enacted which the gentlemen states he voted for and which he finds ont now to have been an interference with the constitutional rights of Congress over the District of Columbia. I very well remember it was resisted on my part, and that I voted against the proposition. Had the nicety of the gentleman from Ohio then been in force it would have been rejected and millions of dollars could have been saved to this District. Perhaps no greater calamity ever befel any community than befel this District of Columbia by the adoption of that very law. I am glad to say the responsibility for its passage rests entirely upon the party now in the minority on the other side of this House.

I recollect, sir, a little more in reference to this question. I recollect very well that the question of universal suffrage and of qualified suffrage was first tested in this District; that universal suffrage was the pioneer law, as applied to this District, and it was in substance subsequently, as I believe, incorporated in all the reconstruction acts.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether that universal suffrage did not permit them to vote for a Delegate who could not himself vote for anything?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is right; and perhaps in that regard it was absurd and amusing; but the question remains that universal suffrage was first tested in this District, that the law for this District was the pioneer law of those afterward embraced in the reconstruction acts, and that now—strange to say—the very first place we find it stricken out is the very place where the pioneer law on the subject was put into the statute-book. This is history, and I leave it to conjecture why it is: whether it is that universal suffrage which was placed upon this District was stricken out because of our finding out subsequently it was an interference with the Constitution or whether it was that universal suffrage as exercised in this District was a failure in its application to the administration here. But so it is; and I would only suggest, therefore, that the next step we should take is to eliminate it from the various State constitutions, so as to be consistent, and leave that question to the States which you compelled to accept universal suffrage; to leave to them the same discretion you propose to leave in this District, and the same control of suffrage you now find necessary to exercise in reference to this District.

I do not think the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLARD] should be incorporated into this proposition, because I believe this is one of the questions which the commission should be left untrammeled about, and in reference to which they should not receive any instructions.

But let them consider the question and state their views, for I should like to hear the views of the six gentlemen likely to be appointed on this commission; I should like to hear their sentiments and their judgment on the question of universal suffrage as tested by its effects in this District.

So far as I am able to hear, almost the entire body of property-holders in this District desire that they shall not be handed back to the tender mercies of universal suffrage. And a great many of the people of color, who are supposed to be more directly benefited by the system of universal suffrage, have said to me that they did not believe that it would be productive of good results. Under these circumstances, I think that this commission should not be instructed in this particular, and I hope they will not.

Mr. BUCKNER. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD.]

Mr. WILLARD. I will not trespass on the patience of the House more than a single moment. But I wish to point out a difference between the power of legislative bodies and that which resides in municipalities; a difference which I believe that those who have discussed this question on the other side have entirely overlooked.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it must be understood that the Federal convention which framed the organic law of this Republic in the use of the term "legislation" used it in the sense in which it had been interpreted in England and in this country up to that time. And it is well known that the English Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over every precinct within the entire empire of Great Britain, while at the same time there is left to the several cities and counties and parishes this principle of self-government which we have derived from them. The autonomy of this country does not reside in State Legislatures so much as it resides in that last unit of self-government, the municipality. And why I protest against the existing system is that it destroys that municipal principle which I believe to be the fundamental idea of our liberty and the very principle upon which our institutions finally rest.

I fully concede that the Congress of the United States has like powers over the District of Columbia with those exercised by the Parliament of Great Britain over the entire empire of Great Britain, and with those exercised by the Legislature of the State of Michigan or the Legislature of Virginia over the States of Michigan or Virginia. But, Mr. Speaker, we have regarded it as an extreme exercise of power for the Legislature of a State to interfere with the local and municipal governments in that State. And I would ask gentlemen on the other side of the House whether they have not, in former times, protested against that principle?

I regarded it, Mr. Speaker, as one of the most triumphant vindications of liberty in this land when a recent governor of the State of Virginia gave his veto to a bill which took from the city of Petersburgh its self-government; and I remember well the glorious words which he put on record on behalf of equal civil liberty in this land. And so I say that if we would recognize the principle of self-government, the very principle upon which our institutions are founded, while we give to Congress what is called the power of exclusive legislation, there is no reason why we should take from the people their municipal and local powers.

If we would have permanence we must recognize this principle. The Fathers of the Republic did recognize it, and they gave to the city of Washington, to the city of Georgetown, and to the city of Alexandria their autonomy. They never believed it to be destructible. It was the unity, the last unit, the principle which they dared not and did not attempt to touch. Neither George Washington, nor Thomas Jefferson, nor John Adams, nor any of our Presidents, nor any of the Congresses down to recent times have undertaken to interfere with it. And since the period in which it has been interferred with, what have we to-day? We have at this very time, in this city of Washington, been obliged to witness changes of government that have been almost akin to anarchy. The people have lived from summer to winter and from winter to summer without knowing what Congress was going to give them. And, amid all the political mutations in this country which Congress reflects, and which would be reflected here on this District, do we not perceive that one Congress may constantly take from the people the officers which a previous Congress has established? If we are to have permanence of government we must throw upon the people of this municipality the responsibility which is given them by the principle of democratic autonomy which is the fundamental idea of our institutions.

Just one word more, Mr. Speaker. It has been said that the earlier Congresses of the United States experienced difficulties from the mobs by which they were surrounded and the violence with which they were threatened. If you wish to preserve this Congress from violence, if you wish to preserve it hereafter from the reach of mobs, you must give to the people their rights. For I can conceive that in this city of Washington, with a population growing up that does not feel the responsibility of government and is not instructed in the principles of liberty, the time may come when this American Congress will feel that they have reared up in their very midst the elements which will destroy our free institutions. I appeal, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the principle contained in my amendment, by everything which is sacred in our institutions or which is vital to the continued welfare of the Republic.

Mr. BUCKNER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question; we appoint by this bill commissioners to provide a government for the District of Columbia. It is well known that the people of the District of Columbia have had the right of suffrage. But for a few years past the District has been governed by commissioners appointed by Congress. Under this arrangement it has been no more satisfactory than the government by the people of the District, as committees of this House have been engaged in investigating their acts, and great frauds have been discovered. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD,] that the Congress of the United States ought to give an expression to the commissioners to be appointed in favor of the people of the District having the right of suffrage.

It is argued that the people of the District of Columbia, as a whole, are not capable of self-government. The resolution does not declare that all shall be entitled to the right of suffrage. That might be restricted. It might be provided that a person should not vote until he had been a resident one or two years, so as to keep down the transient voting population. But right here I want to say one word to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] which is probably foreign to this question. He says that the powers delegated to Congress cannot be redelegated. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution of the United States has delegated the power alone to Congress to make money and to regulate its value, and yet the power to make money has been delegated to banking corporations now, and I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I hope when that question comes up he will occupy the position he does now. Returning to the question under consideration, I will say that I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will prevail.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now move the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution and the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, and the joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BUCKNER. There is some misunderstanding here. I understand that the amendment adopted was the one which I offered from the committee, and not that of the gentleman from Michigan, which was voted down in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. That amendment did not come from the committee, and all of this debate has been by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate has proceeded by the consent of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent to have the words "committe" and "joint committee" wherever they occur stricken out and the word "commission" inserted in lieu thereof.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I ask now that the joint resolution be read as amended.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

That a commission, consisting of two non-residents and one resident thereof, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, and two residents of said District and one non-resident thereof by the presiding officer of the Senate, respectively, is hereby appointed, whose duty it shall be, during the recess of Congress, to prepare a suitable form of government for the District of Columbia, and appropriate draughts of statutes to be enacted by Congress for carrying the same into effect, and report the same to the two Houses, respectively, on the first day of the next session thereof. It shall also be the duty of said commission to prepare and submit to the next session of this Congress a statement of the proper proportion of the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, or any branch thereof, including interest on the funded debt, which should be borne by said District and the United States, respectively, together with the reasons upon which their conclusions are based Said commission are authorized to employ such assistance as may be needed to enable them to discharge the duties hereby imposed on said commission; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the necessary expenses of said commission.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to amend the title of the joint resolution by striking out "joint committee" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "commission;" so that it will read:

Providing for a commission to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

UNDIVIDED INTERESTS IN REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BUCKNER also, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 790) to allow owners of undivided interests in real estate in the District of Columbia to pay taxes on their respective interests, and to redeem the same when sold for taxes.

The bill was read, as follows:

That whenever two or more persons own undivided interests in real estate situate in the District of Columbia, taxes upon the said real estate shall be assessed against each of said interests, separately, whenever the records of titles to said real estate show such separate interests, or whenever the fact of such ownership becomes otherwise known to those charged by law with making such assessment.

SEC. 2. That in all cases in which assessments of taxes against such real estate so owned have heretofore been made, each separate owner, upon prima facie showing of his interest by transcript of his recorded title or by his affidavit of ownership, shall be entitled to pay his proportion of the whole tax so assessed, and thereby relieve his said interest of the lien of said taxes. And in all cases in which sales of such real estate so owned have heretofore been made, in default of payment of the taxes due thereon, the owner of each separate interest shall be entitled to redeem the same by the payment or tender to the purchaser thereof of his proportion of the taxes and other charges that would have to be paid as now provided by law to redeem the whole property, and shall thereupon be re-invested with the title to his said interest in said property.

Mr. BUCKNER. This bill explains itself, and I do not see that there is any necessity for me to make any remarks upon it.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Missouri says that this bill explains itself; then it seems to me that it explains one of the most extraordinary propositions that I ever heard. The idea of having every separate and undivided interest in real estate separately taxed, so that if there are twenty heirs and one of those dies leaving twenty more heirs the public are obliged to deal separately with each of those interests in the real estate is as strange a one as I ever heard of. But the latter clause of the bill is still more unjust.

Mr. BUCKNER. The bill provides that wherever two or more persons own undivided interest in real estate the tax on that real estate should be assessed against each of said interests separately, and each party shall be entitled to pay his proportion of the whole tax so assessed and thereby relieve his interest of the tax.

Mr. HOAR. Leaving the Government to deal on the question of taxation with the other undivided shares.

But the latter clause of the bill seems to me to be absolutely unconstitutional. Here is a man who under existing law has bought at a tax sale real estate to which he is entitled by the laws in force; but this bill provides that any owner of a divided interest may redeem his land sold for taxes, so that the man who has in good faith bought the property at a tax sale for its full value is bound to become a joint owner and tenant in common for six or a dozen years with the man or the parties who have redeemed their lands from tax sale.

Now, I never heard, Mr. Speaker, of an instance where real estate was subjected to taxation, and a lien existed on it for taxation, that the public were bound to cut up the lien or claim by dealing separately with every owner of an undivided claim. It would seem—I do not know where this bill comes from—but it would seem as if it were drawn up by some person for his own personal interests. I do not, of course, know where the bill comes from, but, of course, if it originated with the committee it can have no such purpose.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the gentleman from Massachusetts misapprehends the object of this bill. Whether there is anybody particularly interested in it or not is more than I know. It came to us just as other bills do, (by reference from the House,) and it occurs to me that it is a bill which has at least the credit of equity and justice. Three parties may own a tract of land in this city in undivided interest, and according to the law as it now stands, or at least as it is construed, although one party may be willing to pay his proportion of the tax, he is required to pay the tax on the entire property in order to obtain a release for his share of the tax. The object of this bill is to obviate that.

Mr. HOAR. But he has a lien on the interest of his associates if he pays the whole tax, does he not?

Mr. BUCKNER. It may be that in equity he would have a lien on the interest of his associates if he paid the whole tax. But it is obviously nothing but just and proper that if he pays his part of the tax he should be released from his obligation to that extent. The Government would lose nothing, because it would have a lien on the remaining two-thirds interest if the owners of that two-thirds interest failed to pay the tax. The object of this bill is to allow a party who owns but a third interest to pay his share of the tax, and then leave the Government to collect the other portion of the tax from the owners of the other two-thirds interest. It does not affect the interest of the Government or of the District and is a matter of pure equity, and, as I understand the law, it is according to the law now.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Suppose a party owning one-third of an undivided piece of property pays his tax; then a party who owns another third does not pay his tax, and the property is sold; and a person interested with the party whose property is sold to the extent of half his interest comes forward to redeem that half of that third, can he do it under your bill?

Mr. BUCKNER. I think he can.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to follow that out a little, if it will not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly not.

Mr. HOAR. I will make a statement preliminary to a question. As I understand, when two persons own each an undivided half interest in a certain piece of property they have a right to a partition; each of them is entitled to have one-half in value, not necessarily in quantity, set off to him in one lot or parcel, and the other has the rest. One of these parties cannot before partition sell one-half of his interest by metes and bounds, because if he did when they came to make a partition his associate would have to take his share in two pieces; he would have to divide in one part with the man who originally owned the whole undivided half, and then he would have to divide the part he owned with another person. Therefore, instead of taking his interest in one piece, he would have his interest impaired in value by being cut up in several pieces with the several associates with whom he would have to make several partitions.

Suppose that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] and myself owned a piece of land together. He pays his tax, and so much of my part of the land is sold for my unpaid tax as is needed; one-half of my interest in the land is sold to some one else, and the other half is left to me. I come in and compel the gentleman from New York to set off so much in one piece, dividing his interest from mine; and then the man to whom the sale has been made comes in and compels the gentleman from New York to make another partition with him. Thus, instead of having one piece of land in one place, when the division is made, the gentleman from New York would have two pieces of land in two different places, and in that way we will have seriously impaired the value of his property.

It is for that reason that wherever the common law prevails men who own a piece of real estate in common cannot sell by metes and bounds any portion less than their undivided part. Each one may divide his undivided half by selling a lesser undivided interest. Does not this proposition reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia destroy or seriously impair the value of the land owned by the man who pays his tax? How do you get over that?

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not understand that to be so.

Mr. HOAR. That is the law everywhere.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I am apprehensive that this bill, if enacted into a law, would lead to serious difficulties. I think it would be very embarrassing to those men who are copartners in real estate, and much more embarrassing to the Government itself.

The principle of taxation upon real estate is not to recognize individual ownership. We do not know who owns the land; we tax the land. If the Government should enter into a recognition of the interests of the different persons who have entered into a copartnership for purposes of speculation in real estate, receiving from A a portion of the tax and from B another portion of the tax, crediting and receipting to each for his portion of the tax, it would lead to complications and difficulties which would result in loss of revenue to the Government, and would lead to litigation between the parties themselves in interest.

I see no reason for departing from the well-established usages in every State and every municipality in the United States with reference to taxation upon real estate. We do not know who owns the land; we do not care who owns the land. The land is assessed so much by way of tax, and when the tax is paid the land is released, and not before. In receiving a portion of the whole tax, no release can be given or should be given for $1 of the amount of the whole tax which is due upon that piece of land.

I am afraid of this experiment, this innovation upon the well-established rules and regulations in reference to the system of municipal taxation throughout the whole United States. I think we had better stand where we are in that matter. If men are so foolish—and I think no common-sense man would do any such thing—as to own real estate in copartnership with anybody else, then they must take the consequences. I hope, therefore, that this bill will not pass.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not want to occupy further the time of the House with this bill; and I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, in order that we may take up other measures of more importance in the hands of my colleagues on the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN ALBANY, NEW YORK.

Mr. ADAMS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3739) to amend the act approved March 12, 1872, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a fire-proof building in Albany, New York;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

Mr. HENDEE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1121) to authorize the Secretary of War to construct a bridge across the Potomac River, at or near the Three Sisters Islands, and appropriating $140,000 for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RECORDING DEEDS, MORTGAGES, ETC.

Mr. HENDEE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3740) providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that sections 446 and 447 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia, passed at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, 1873 and 1874, be repealed; and that the following be enacted in lieu thereof:

All deeds, deeds of trust, mortgages, conveyances, covenants, agreements, or any instrument of writing which by law is entitled to be recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds shall take effect and be valid, as to creditors and as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, from the time when such deed, deed of trust, mortgage conveyance, covenant, agreement, or instrument in writing shall, after having been acknowledged, proved, or certified, as the case may be, be delivered to the recorder of deeds for record, and from that time only; and the recorder of deeds shall note on each deed or other instrument of writing required by law to be recorded, the time of delivery of the same to him to be recorded.

The second section provides that the act shall not be so construed as to affect any deed or other instrument of writing heretofore recorded.

Mr. HENDEE. I do not propose to read the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to in this bill; but I will state the purpose of the measure. As a preliminary to that, however, I desire to say that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CRAPO,] reported some two months since a bill very similar in form to this; and it was passed by this body and the Senate, but was vetoed by the President upon the ground of ambiguity. In this new bill we have obviated that difficulty.

Under the existing law in this District, deeds may be withheld from record for six months by the party holding them. This has led and might hereafter lead to much fraud as between purchasers and sellers of real estate. The object of this bill is to make every deed take effect from the time when it shall be entered for record; and it is provided that the recorder shall note upon the instrument the time when it is received for record. Then, as a matter of course, everybody purchasing or having anything to do with property obtains from the record notice as to the true state of the case. This is all there is of the bill; and I hope that it may pass.

Mr. REAGAN. I call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] to the fact that the bill now provides for recording "the time of delivery" of the deed or other instrument to the recorder. I suggest that we should provide for noting the day and the hour. Such a modification will conform to the law in a number of States, where the provision has been adopted in order to avoid confusion or difficulty from the legal principle of the indivisibility of a day. I think the amendment I suggest may be useful.

Mr. HENDEE. I have no objection to the modification suggested. I move to amend by striking out "time" and inserting "day and hour."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANY—YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HENDEE also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 634) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint-stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," approved March 2, 1867.

The bill was read.

Section 1 empowers the joint-stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association to borrow, on the security of the real estate now owned by it in square No. 407 in the city of Washington, not exceeding the sum of $33,000, at a lawful rate of interest, for the purpose of paying off the debt now due from the company to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

Section 2, in order to secure the amount authorized to be borrowed by the preceding section, authorizes the joint-stock company to execute and deliver its note for the amount borrowed, bearing such lawful rate of interest and payable at such time, principal and interest, as may be agreed upon between it and the persons from whom it may borrow the money, and, to secure the payment of such note and interest, to convey the property to two trustees in fee-simple, with power in the trustees, or the survivor of them, to sell the property at public auction in case of default made in the payment of the note, or any installment of interest due thereon, upon such terms and after such notice by advertisement as the trustees, or the survivor of them, may deem best for the interest of all parties concerned, and to convey the same to the purchaser in fee simple.

The third section provides that the rents and revenues derived from said property shall be retained by the board of directors of said joint-stock company and applied to the payment of the indebtedness herein authorized, and shall not be applied to the payment of interest on the capital stock of said corporation until said indebtedness is fully paid.

The fourth section provides that nothing therein contained shall be construed as authorizing said joint-stock company to encumber said real estate for any other purpose or in any other manner.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, a bill precisely like this was passed in this House after a report and explanation by myself. The same bill was also passed by the Senate. As this bill has come from the Senate, if now concurred in by the House and it should receive the signature of the President, it will become the law.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GLENWOOD CEMETERY.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I am directed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back a bill (H. R. No. 2235) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the proprietors of Glenwood Cemetery," approved July 27, 1854, with a substitute, (H. R. No. 3741.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute will be considered as an original bill.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Very well. It is an act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the proprietors of Glenwood Cemetery," approved July 27, 1854.

The bill, which was read, provides that nothing in the act of incorporation shall prevent the owner or owners of any lot or lots therein from making improvements or decorations therein without let or hinderance as may not be inconsistent with the objects and purposes of said cemetery.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDENBERGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CELEBRATION OF THE FOURTH OF JULY.

Mr. HARDENBERGH also, from the same committee, reported back a joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) relative to the celebration of July 4, 1876; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the commissioners of the District of Columbia to expend the sum of $1,000 in the purchase of fire-works to aid in the celebration of the approaching centennial anniversary of American Independence.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. A petition was addressed to the commissioners of the District of Columbia asking them to appropriate a sum of money for the purchase of fire-works for the celebration of the centennial anniversary of the Fourth of July of American Independence. The commissioners referred that petition to the Committee for the District of Columbia. There was also a request that the Government should make an appropriation for the same purpose on their part. The committee is disposed to do what is right in the matter. I ask the House whether they will consider any other sum is necessary than that provided for in this joint resolution. The money here appropriated is to be taken from the funds belonging to the city held by the commissioners, and this merely authorizes them to make the expenditure for the purpose specified. The point for this House to consider is whether, in addition to this sum, Congress shall make a further appropriation on its part. The committee express no opinion on the matter, but leave it entirely to the consideration of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to facilitating the celebration of the Fourth of July, but I do not think we ought to appropriate money to aid the people of one city to celebrate it when we do not appropriate for others. In that respect I do not think it is just.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. This joint resolution does not propose to appropriate money belonging to the Government, but it simply authorizes the commissioners to expend the sum of $1,000 out of the funds belonging to the city for that purpose.

A MEMBER. How much does the joint resolution appropriate?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. This simply authorizes the commissioners of the District of Columbia to expend $1,000 out of the money in their hands coming from the people of this District of Columbia. They found they had no right to spend any such sum for the purpose specified without the authority of Congress. It would be strange, in the centennial year, when the people are aroused everywhere throughout the country to a sense of patriotism, if here, in the capital city of the Union, beneath the very dome of that nation's Capitol, not a single fire-work should be allowed to explode. It would look very strange, Mr. Speaker, and therefore the commissioners of this District, having no right to appropriate the money of the people for that purpose, have asked Congress to give them the power which this joint resolution simply proposes to do. It appropriates the small sum of $1,000, and I do not see why the House should hesitate.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the people here raise their own money to get up this Fourth-of-July celebration.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I represent the minority of the Committee for the District of Columbia, which was opposed to the report of this joint resolution. The gentleman from New Jersey has very eloquently referred to the celebration in the nation's capital in this the centennial year of the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence, but I think it would be much more to the credit of the people of this capital, much more to the credit of this Congress, to appropriate $1,000 and let it be paid toward the extinction of the indebtedness of this District rather than to be wasted in fire-crackers and tomfoolery of this kind.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. It may by some be considered a very serious venture to say anything against the use of fire-works on the Fourth of July; but, sir, this proposition reminds me that I had the honor to present to the House on Saturday last a letter calling the attention of Congress to the fact that within the last few years, since 1870, $700,000,000 of the people's property has been burned in our country. I was myself an honored messenger to carry $100,000 to the city of Portland, Maine, a few years ago, when it was devastated by Fourth-of-July fire-works. The boys, or the city authorities, very nearly burned that city up in celebrating the Fourth of July.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, this is a serious question, and that it becomes an important question whether Congress shall appropriate or recommend the appropriation of anybody's money for the unguarded burning of fire-works in such a city as this. I acknowledge and honor the patriotic spirit of the gentleman from New Jersey. I share that spirit with him. I procure for my own children, and superintend myself, a certain amount of fire-works on every Fourth of July. And I would cultivate a proper disposition in respect to that day, especially this year. But it is another thing, in the present condition of the country, for Congress heedlessly, and without due consideration, to recommend the expenditure of large or small sums of money for such a purpose. In this particular exigency, with dangers peculiar to the centennial year confronting us, we are requested by respectable and influential men and underwriters in the metropolis of the country to take some steps in order that great disasters may if possible be avoided on that day. I have, within forty-eight hours, presented a memorial appealing to the wisdom of Congress to direct the attention of the people of the country in some way to the danger of this growing evil, with such suggestions as are calculated to diminish it. I therefore hope that we shall at least suggest prudence by refusing in this case to recommend this expenditure, though it be only a thousand dollars, for fire-works at Washington on the Fourth of July.

Mr. HARRISON. I must say, sir, that I am astonished that the gentleman from New York should rise here in this House and ask us to abolish the Fourth of July. Sir, a hundred years ago on the 4th of July our nation was born; and now the gentleman would deny the boys, the coming young America, the privilege of burning fire-works in celebration of it. He is afraid of burning up things. Why, sir, we will have the fire-works between here and the Smithsonian Institution, in that park where the railroad is which we cannot remove, and which is ruining the park, and we will burn that up to the tune of the finest music the Marine Band can give. [Laughter.]

But seriously, I appeal to the gentleman in all seriousness, is he going to permit us to have no fire-works in this city on the Fourth of July? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. O, no; nothing of the sort.

Mr. HARRISON. Patriotism, sir, is dying out. They have shown down in Cincinnati that it does not exist there. It is all hazy. [Laughter.] And here the gentleman wants this Congress to acknowledge that we have no patriotism. Sir, I will never consent to it. [Cries of "Never, Never!"] Nor do I think this House will. I will stand here if it takes me all summer voting for fire-works on the next Fourth of July. [Laughter.] And I ask my republican friends to aid me in voting for it. If my democratic friends will not vote for it I will turn republican. I will be with the party that is faithful to the Fourth of July.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. But it should be done prudently. Let us not do anything which may end in burning up the city.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman I believe claims to be what is called an independent, and I do not wonder that he does not want any fire-works. I think every man should belong to some great party in this country. The gentleman comes here and talks to us as if he were a free-lance. And this shows what a man becomes by joining the free-lances. If he would turn republican he would be in favor of the Fourth of July, for he would not dare to go with that party before the country without it. If he would turn democrat he would want it, because patriotism would be big in his bosom, as big as it is in mine. [Laughter.]

Let us have the Fourth of July. Let us have fire-works. And if something must be burned, let us put them where they will burn up something without doing any harm. Let us put them where they will burn out this railroad track, iron and all, that crosses our park. Let us put them where they may burn up those low buildings that lie away down in the neighborhood of the Tiber. And when they are burned out we will have a magnificent park in the city of Washington, and that park dedicated to the Fourth of July, 1876.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I see no particular occasion for the display of all this eloquence on a matter of this kind. It seems to me one of the simplest propositions ever presented here. My friend, the gentleman from New York, with all his patriotism, with all his legislative tact and ability, stands here this afternoon and votes $280,000 to pave for this District of Columbia a street that wealth may ride over and enjoy while he refuses to the toiling millions an amusement to cost a thousand dollars on the centennial anniversary of American liberty.

Mr. NEAL. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Certainly.

Mr. NEAL. Only this morning a poor laboring-man of this city appeared before our committee, making complaint that he had been unable for six years to obtain payment of a debt due him by the District amounting to the little pittance of $40. Now, my question to the gentleman is whether it would not be better to take this thousand dollars and apply it to the payment of such just debts?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Let the commissioners go back and compel delinquents to pay their taxes and there will be money enough to pay these just claims. We have here the singular spectacle presented of a municipal government in the shadow of the Capitol of the United States without power to grant a single dollar for a celebration of the Fourth of July, and when they come here and ask Congress to give them that power, it is doubted whether it should be granted.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Have cities as a rule the authority to vote money collected from the taxes of the people to celebrate the Fourth of July?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Everywhere throughout the country. And let me say that having had the honor to present the joint resolution which was passed so handsomely by this House for centennial celebrations in which the people might all harmonize and agree, my own city is coming forward to the front and appropriating a large sum of money for that purpose; and every little village and hamlet throughout the country is giving of its means for the same purpose.

Mr. WHITE. Has it not been decided to be unconstitutional?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I am unable to answer the question of the gentleman as to whether the question has been tested in the courts or not, but I would invite the patriotism of the people of the country to do it everywhere.

Mr. FORT. Of course the courts have no jurisdiction over the Fourth of July.

[Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLAND. I only desire to say, that in my country when we want a Fourth-of-July celebration we usually go out among the neighbors, and some will supply a little money and some a quarter of mutton or of beef, and some bread, and we meet together and have a social Fourth of July at our own expense. I desire to move an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman, if he will accept it, and it is that the Speaker appoint the honorable gentleman from New Jersey as a committee of one, and let him take the hat and go around among the members and the people generally, and I think we can raise money enough to avoid this difficulty.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. One word, Mr. Speaker. The humor and music of the captain of the Marine Band cannot make it appear to the intelligent gentlemen of this House that I said anything against the proper use of fire-works on the Fourth of July. [Laughter and applause.] I seriously called the attention of the House to the great fact that within a few years seven hundred million dollars' worth of property, equal to about one-third of the national debt, has been burned up, and that in a large measure by the careless use of fire-works. My plain, acknowledged object was to make some impression here and upon the country so that fire-works, wherever authorized and indulged in on the Fourth of July next, shall be guarded with more than the usual care; that the boys, when they go forth in the morning, shall be warned by their fathers or guardians to be careful, and that the city authorities, wherever they are in use, shall enforce stern police measures to avoid great disasters. It may save us immense loss; and, unimportant as this discussion is, if it gets into the newspapers, however unimportant it may now appear to us, the accidental introduction of the subject during this half hour may save the country $100,000,000. I am in favor of fire-works, but I say let every man furnish his own, [laughter,] and if the city of Washington or the government of the city has not $1,000 at its disposal for such purpose I would carry round the hat and let the people here subscribe rather than that any careless action on the part of this House sh all seem to furnish any apology whatever for an indiscriminate and heedless use of these dangerous combustibles, of which all of us are always more or less afraid, on the glorious Fourth. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist on his amendment?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I hope the gentleman will not try to make nonsense out of the resolution. If he does not wish to vote for it he can vote against it.

Mr. BLAND. I will withdraw the amendment.

The question was on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution; and on a division there were—ayes 56, noes 85; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints Mr. HARDENBERGH and Mr. HOLMAN to act as tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. We are both on the same side. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I wish it understood that the gentleman from Indiana is with me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair appoints Mr. BLAND as teller in place of Mr. HOLMAN.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 56; no quorum voting.

Mr. COCHRANE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 102, noes 62.

ACCOUNTS OF CONSULAR OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before announcing the result of the vote on adjournment, the Chair desires to lay before the House some executive communications and some requests for leave of absence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, then by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a House communication of January 19, 1876, relative to the amounts now due the United States from consular officers of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IMPROVEMENT OF SOUTH PASS, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the inspection and improvement of the South Pass, Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JURISDICTION OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DOBBINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3743) extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. LONG.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3744) for the relief of John H. Long; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE APPOINTED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced as the committee of conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the post-office appropriation bill Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. BLOUNT, and Mr. WALDRON.

REPAVING OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee for the District of Columbia reported back the bill (S. No. 680) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey, was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of sickness.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, was granted leave of absence for ten days on account of sickness of himself and family.

Mr. FAULKNER was granted leave of absence for twelve days.

Mr. GARFIELD was granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. HARDENBERGH was granted leave of absence for one week.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Henry Frank.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia: The petition of G. E. W. Sharretts, of Washington, District of Columbia, for compensation for labor done in preparing Government salary tables, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. JONES, of Kentucky: The petition of Dr. William H. Curran for compensation for services rendered as assistant surgeon of the Twentieth Kentucky Regiment of Volunteers prior to date of his muster into service as assistant surgeon, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH: The petition of Elizabeth Barrett, widow of Samuel C. Barrett, deceased, a private in Captain Heeter's company of the Forty-fourth Regiment of Maryland Militia in the war of 1812, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. WOOD, of New York: The petition of John Monte, for an increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 20, 1876.

Prayer by Rev. P. H. BURGHENETT, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report and maps of the last inspection made by Major Cyrus B. Comstock, Corps of Engineers United States Army, of the South Pass improvement of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution of February 9, 1876, calling for a statement of all balances due to the United States from public officers, and all such balances due from other parties no longer in the public service, distinguishing those whose accounts with the United States have been finally passed upon and adjudicated and those whose accounts are yet unsettled and subject to additional credits, stating the nature of such accounts and the credits in question; the statement to embrace the accounts of all such officers or parties in which such balances have respectively accrued since the 1st day of January, 1830, and to set forth respectively and as near as practicable the period over which the accounts extended and the amounts involved therein.

Also to furnish a detailed statement of the stocks held by the United States in trust or to secure moneys paid, the character of such stocks, under what law or by what authority, and at what time the same were acquired, and on what amount thereof, if any, has there been a default in the payment of interest due thereon.

In reply I have to transmit herewith the statement of balances called for, also a recapitulation showing the amount of such losses, also the amount of the receipts and disbursements of the Government for the same period and the ratio of losses per $1,000 to the aggregate received and disbursed, arranged as nearly as practicable in periods of four years each; also a statement showing, as far as known to this Department, the stocks held by the United States in trust or to secure moneys paid, as called for by the terms of the resolution.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Hon. T. W. FERRY,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie upon the table and be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. In regard to the printing of the document I should like to have that question referred to the Committee on Printing. I will say that my attention was called to the document itself by an officer of the Government in the Treasury Department. It covers several volumes, most of them matters of no possible moment, which can be of no interest to any mortal man, woman, or child. I think it would be great injustice to thousands of worthy men to print this document. It seems to me the motion to print ought to be referred to some committee to select whatever anybody may properly desire to have published. It contains the name of every officer of the Government from 1830 to this time, and the state of his account. I may as well confess that I think the resolution originally was intended for political effect, because I cannot imagine for what else it could have been intended. But some Senator will be disappointed in the results of the figures as given, and I think they would derive no comfort from their publication. At the same time I would be perfectly willing to allow any committee of this body to look at the document and say what parts of it should be published and what parts should not; but the fact is that the whole document itself is so voluminous that no one should desire to have it published.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it?

Mr. SHERMAN. It gives the accounts of every officer of the Government from 1830 to this time. I notice many cases of this class: During the Indian wars, and during our recent civil war, a soldier may have been killed in battle who was charged with a lot of muskets, and against his account they all stand in the balance charged to him, while it was stated that he was killed in battle, &c. Consuls have died abroad and it has been impossible to settle their accounts, and yet balances are charged at the Treasury Department against the consul. Honorable men, men of the highest rank in the public service, men of the greatest distinction in this country, have little balances charged against them, and they would now be published in the list of defaulters. There may have been nothing due from them, but if there were some little discrepancy in their accounts they are still unbalanced. Such a list would injure greatly the reputation of honorable officers in the civil, military, and naval service, if published, although they are little matters, sometimes amounting to but a few dollars.

However, I merely call attention to the fact, and move that the motion to print be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to designate how much of the document ought to be published.

Mr. DAVIS. I had not an opportunity of hearing the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury read. I came in just as the reading was being finished. Therefore I do not know its full contents; but I infer from the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Finance Committee, that it is in answer probably to a resolution which I offered calling for the names and amounts due by different parties to the Government. My recollection is that I asked for a list of the defaulters since 1865, after the close of the war, but that the Committee on Finance went back a number of years, I do not know how far, and wanted all the accounts stated, so that it should be fully known how many defaulters there were and for what amounts as well previous to 1865 as since that time. It will be well recollected by the Senate that probably for three or four sessions I have offered a resolution asking for a list of the defaulters to the Government since 1865. That resolution was often, and almost at each session I believe, denied; either voted down or such amendments added to it as made it almost impossible to answer it. When the last resolution passed the Senate I did hope that there would come an answer and that we should be furnished with the large number of defaulters since 1865, some of them for immense amounts, in individual cases I believe amounting to a million dollars. I did hope that there would be such an answer as should be intelligent and short and to the point. But the Finance Committee saw proper to amend the resolution. I presume they had very good reasons for their action, for the names of the defaulters to the Government are legion, I believe, and the amounts are hundreds of millions, perhaps. The Finance Committee, through its chairman, said it would take very little work to go back a number of years; I forget the exact number of years—perhaps thirty years or more. I then said to the chairman, and perhaps to the Senate, that I did not want to delay the information. I do not recollect exactly what occurred or whether it was in the Senate or privately; but certainly something took place between us to the effect that I did not want to delay the information. Therefore I agreed at once to the request of the committee that the call should go back a number of years. It now turns out that the result of going back a number of years has been to bring such an amount of names and of accounts here that it would be wrong to print the document. Mr. President, I believe the country ought to know who has defaulted.

Mr. MORTON. Do I understand the Senator to say that he only asked for the names of those who have defaulted since 1865?

Mr. DAVIS. Those in default to the Government since 1865. That was my resolution, according to my recollection. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I made three or four attempts to have such a resolution passed, and each time it was voted down or sent to some committee or denied from some cause or other. In one instance especially it was amended, I believe, by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] so as to go back to such an extent as to make an answer almost impossible.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask my friend if it is not as interesting to have the names of those defaulting in 1855, 1856, 1857, 1858, and 1859 as well as in the last few years?

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer my friend from California that probably the volume now sent here contains those years, but objection is made to printing it. It is said a motion to print should be sent to the Committee on Printing, or some other committee, to examine the document. I have no objection to going back to the days of the foundation of the Government. We want to know who the defaulters are; and if they are so numerous as to make it almost impossible to print the list without a large expense, I think the sooner the country and the Senate know it the better.

Mr. SARGENT. As it strikes me, by going back anterior to 1865 the accounts of the defaulters are so numerous as to swell the volume beyond the propriety of printing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say but a word more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield with pleasure, for I want light.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is true that the Senator from West Virginia did only call for a list of the defaulters since 1865; and therefore I said, without referring to him; that the plain and obvious purpose was a political purpose, to show that since the war republican officeholders had been guilty of defalcation. As a matter of course, meeting it in that way, you would naturally say, "Well, it may be so; republican officers have been guilty of defalcation; but, if so, let us compare republican officers with democratic officers;" and therefore it was that a common sentiment of fairness induced the Senate to go back to 1830, which was the last time when these statements were made up. That, it is true, involved a great deal of work.

Mr. DAVIS. I know my friend will allow me to correct him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. My recollection is (and I am about as positive in it as a man can be without having the record before him) that in 1857 a thorough report was made of the name of every defaulter; and that for two or three administrations there was reported to Congress a detailed statement of every man in default from the foundation of the Government to that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. The papers on file will show that the statement referred to was made up to 1830. The Secretary of the Treasury in the letter read says he has commenced from the time the last report was made in 1830. There may have been some general statements made in the mean time, but nothing like the detail here. These papers were shown to me. As a matter of course, the Secretary of the Treasury felt bound to go back and do this work. Here (exhibiting) are some of the tables sent here—great, long tables. There are general results from these tables that are shown also in the tabular statements that accompany the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no objection to printing this document except on account of the great cost that will be involved and the unfairness and injustice that will be done to innocent people now in their graves.

Mr. President, these tables show that most of the persons named as defaulting officers were men in the military, naval, and civil service of the United States, who are now dead. The names of their sureties are given here, many of whom are dead; the amounts range from $1 up to $100,000. Scandals without number all over this broad country of ours will be published to the world without any good whatever if we print this document; and yet I feel bound to say that, by the general results it is shown that during the period for which the Senator from West Virginia called for information, the amount of defalcation and loss is less than one-tenth, in proportion to the amount expended, than the amount before 1860, when somebody else was responsible for the Government. I do not think it is necessary to print more than the tables that accompany the Secretary's letter; but if it is, here are all the details. I think it would be a scandal to the Senate of the United States to publish these documents, which contain the names of the highest officers of the Government, who believe that their accounts are settled.

Mr. DAVIS. If, as the Senator says, previous to 1860, the names of defaulters are much more frequent and the amounts larger than since, let that fact go to the country; let us know it. The Senator says that there are a number of people who are indebted to the Government, and that it will be a scandal to let the country know that they do owe the Government. I differ with him very widely indeed on that point. The resolution as amended by the Finance Committee was formed in such a way as especially to avoid any accounts in which there were apparent discrepancies, and the Secretary was directed to say, according to my recollection, where there was an account stated, what its condition was, not simply to state that a man appeared to owe the Government so and so, but to state the condition of the account; to show the reasons why the indebtedness existed.

It has been, I think, about twenty years since a list of the defaulters of this Government has been published. That is my recollection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Over thirty.

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be thirty. So much the worse if it is thirty. We ought to have it now. Previous to that time we had frequent reports, yearly reports. Bear in mind, Senators, that there is now a law on the statute-book which requires the Secretary of the Treasury or the Comptroller of the Treasury every year to report who is indebted to the Government, and I say that each and every year this list has failed of being published. If it has been for thirty years, then for thirty years has the law been disobeyed. It is well-known to all Senators who have taken the trouble to look into the matter that there is now on the statute-book and has been ever since the foundation of the Government or soon after, a law which requires each and every year a list of the defaulters to be published, and if it has been omitted for thirty years, there has been for thirty years a violation of the statutes of the United States. It ought to have been published long ago.

I do not wish at present to say anything more about this list, for I have not seen it; but if it is large, we ought to know it, and, as I have said, there is now a statute which requires it, and that statute for thirty years, as the Senator from Ohio puts it—but I think it is about twenty years—has been disregarded. It is time now that it should be obeyed.

This information has now come from the Secretary of the Treasury. I want nothing that is improper; and I have no objection to its going to a committee, and if there is anything improper, they can strike it out or refuse to order it to be printed. But I certainly want the name of every man who is indebted to the Government; and the Secretary of the Treasury under the resolution no doubt has stated the cause, has given the reasons, where there are unsettled accounts. Certainly he should have done so. I have no objection to the document going to a committee, but I think it ought to be published, and I shall insist on its being published. At the proper time, if it does not come from the committee, I shall ask the committee what has become of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to show the Senate the injustice of publishing these statements, I have opened these accounts cursorily, and I find on a page which I have opened without reference to who the person is—I do not read the name—that a certain person, a captain, Nineteenth Infantry, was overpaid in 1862 $388.06, and he is reported as "killed." Consequently there was an officer who had been overpaid, who was killed in battle and was not able to settle his account. Do you want to publish his name and wound the feelings of his wife and children? Here are on this same page men without number who are charged as officers, first and second lieutenants, captains, and majors, with guns and equipments, and they were killed or died in hospital, so that their accounts are not settled. No one pretends that the money can be collected from them, and no doubt the guns were either lost in battle or handed over. Is it desirable to publish the names of all these men; to hold them out to the world in this way, so that somebody hereafter may throw up into the teeth of the family of a soldier who was probably killed in the service and lost his accouterments in battle that he was a defaulter to the Government? It seems to me that a sentiment of justice would prevent us from giving publication to these items. The officer to whom I have referred called my attention to the fact that while the Department was obeying a simple, plain duty, no one pretended that this money was due by these people; and yet it is charged on the books of the Treasury Department as a claim against them, but it never would be and never could be settled.

Now I say I will not, for one, whatever may be the result, consent to the publication of a great mass of information to make scandal and reproach against honorable men, who probably gave their lives to the service of the country, unless compelled to do so by the mandate of the Senate. I am willing, so far as there is any advantage to be gained by showing that men have not settled their accounts, to publish the fact. If there are any political offenders in this list, any man who has stolen money or robbed or plundered the Treasury, or done wrong, if it can be shown, I would publish him to the world and nail him to the gate-post; but I would not make this information the means of scattering infamy, and disgrace, and reproach, and of pointing the finger of scorn at men who probably are as deserving as any of us. That is the only feeling I have. The Senator from West Virginia, I have no doubt, does not want to do injustice; and yet here he will find in 1833, 1834, 1835, or 1836, the names of men now dead, honored names in the democratic party, contained in these lists, that I would not publish for any consideration in the world.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me a word?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator has stated to the Senate that I asked for the list since 1865, not previous to 1865. I am perfectly willing now that that list shall be published. I did not ask for, and I do not believe the country wants to know that a soldier was indebted for a knapsack, or a gun, or anything of that kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. But these soldiers' accounts were not made up until after 1865, and they did not appear to be defaulters until then.

Mr. DAVIS. I asked for the defaulters since 1865; not whether the accounts were made up then or not, but the men who have defaulted to the Government since 1865, and the Committee on Finance went back twenty or thirty years. I have no objection now to striking out the name of every man who belonged to the Army who was charged with a knapsack or any other item; that is not the class of men we are after.

The Senator has said that my resolution was for political purposes. I will not say that the refusal to publish this list is for political purposes. I should hardly venture that far; though the Senator did venture to say that the resolution calling for the information since 1865 might have been influenced by political purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia if he would be willing to have the resolution under which this information is furnished read, that we may see exactly what it is?

Mr. DAVIS. I should be glad to have the original resolution, as passed by the Senate, read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us find out where the politics come in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The communication is:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution of February 9, 1876, calling for a statement of "all balances due to the United States from public officers, and all such balances due from other parties no longer in the public service, distinguishing those whose accounts with the United States have been finally passed upon and adjudicated, and those whose accounts are yet unsettled and subject to additional credits."

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I wanted was the original vote of the Senate on the resolution to show how it stood and what amendment was made to it, so as to find out exactly how we have got so much of this information; but I will not detain the Senate about it at this moment.

Mr. DAVIS. There is no difference of opinion on that, I will say to the Senator from Vermont. The Senator from Ohio and myself agree that the original resolution asked for the list since 1865. It was amended by the Committee on Finance so as to go back for thirty years, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to referring the communication to the Committee on Printing? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so referred.

Mr. DAVIS. Before that is disposed of, I will say that I have no objection to its going there with the understanding that it will be reported at an early day, and with the statement on my part that the resolution has been voted down here several times by the Senate and referred to different committees, and the information declined each year until this session, and now it comes in a form that its printing is objected to. I want to make that statement and let it go.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 3486) for the relief of James F. Buckner; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2867) to amend section 2958 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill (H. R. No. 3631) to confirm to the city of Chicago, Illinois, the title to certain public grounds was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 3730) to remove the political disabilities of John D. Simms and Samuel V. Turner, of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 3736) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Wabash River was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 7) to provide for the sale or exchange of a certain piece of land in the Wallabout Bay, in the State of New York, to the city of Brooklyn, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 124) requesting the President of the United States to negotiate an additional article to the treaty of July 28, 1868, between the United States of America and the Ta-Tsing Empire, (China,) was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 125) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the authorities of the city of Paterson, New Jersey, four pieces of artillery, to be used in celebrating July 4, 1876, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of T. A. Thompson and others, citizens of New Orleans, Louisiana, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3187) to amend title 53 of the Revised Statutes relating to merchant seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Louis Duval, father of Edward Duval, late of Company D, Tenth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, praying for an amendment of the pension laws extending the time of limitation for obtaining arrears of pension to July 4, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of the Scott County Medical Society, of Davenport, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 595) to incorporate the National Surgical Institute of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin, with a verbal amendment, and as it is simply intended to expedite and facilitate the execution of existing law, I am directed by the committee unanimously to ask that it may be passed now.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. MORTON. I object to the consideration of that to-day. I want to examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar, objection being made to its present consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that I will call it up to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 914) to repeal an act entitled "An act to incorporate the proprietors of the Glenwood Cemetery," approved July 27, 1854, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 752) authorizing the recorder of the District of Columbia to appoint an assistant with certain powers, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, to report it back with sundry amendments. I give notice that I will call up this bill immediately after the Senate shall have finished the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 873) to provide for the 8 per cent. certificates of indebtedness issued for work done under the direction of the board of public works and chargeable to the private property benefited thereby, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James G. Naylor, praying that he may be allowed to complete the work of building the western market, in the city of Washington, in accordance with his contract heretofore made with the District commissioners, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate of April 3, instructing that committee to inquire what additional jail accommodations are required for the use of the District of Columbia, to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, the Senate having already passed a bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the petition and papers of Captain J. M. Keeler, of New York, late provost-marshal for Oregon, praying for re-imbursement of amount paid for transportation of himself and servant, &c., from New York to Salem, Oregon, in 1863, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Montgomery, lieutenant-colonel United States Army, praying compensation for services as major from July 4, 1863, to June 14, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 68) for the improvement of the military wagon-road from Scottsburgh, Oregon, to Camp Stewart, Oregon, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1337) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No 2473) to authorize claimants upon even-numbered sections of land within the twenty-mile limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad to make proof and payment for their claims at the ordinary minimum rate of $1.25 per acre, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 920) to authorize Louis Petoskey, of Michigan, to enter a certain tract of land which embraces his home and improvements, reported it without amendment.

Mr. KERNAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 904) for the relief of William C. Nichols, late assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago, Illinois, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 723) for the relief of Nannie Hall, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 354) for the relief of Moore N. Falls, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of McKnight & Richardson, praying payment of the balance of their claim of $9,102.50, with interest from May, 1861, being a balance on vouchers for $30,778.18, issued for supplies furnished to the Army in May, 1861, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of E. C. Burdorff, late of Company H, Thirty-fifth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, praying payment of balance of bounty, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of R. K. Byrd, late colonel First Tennessee Volunteers, praying to be re-imbursed for the amount of moneys expended by him in recruiting, organizing, and drilling troops for the Union Army during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 763) to change the date of commission of Henry Romeyn, first lieutenant Fifth United States Infantry, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) restoring Albert W. Preston to his late rank of colonel on the retired list of the United States Army, submitted a report thereon; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 928) for the relief of Albert W. Preston; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the report, ordered to be printed.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred eleven petitions, papers, and documents asking for the repeal of the bankrupt law, as also some twenty-four petitions, documents, and papers remonstrating against the repeal of that law, have had the same under consideration and instruct me to report them back, and also to report by a bill, which I send to the desk.

The bill (S. No. 929) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the operation of the several statutes in relation to bankruptcy and to recommend legislation thereon was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 390) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereof, have had the same under consideration; and in view of the recommendation made by the bill just reported, this being a bill to repeal the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, have instructed me to report it back and recommend that the consideration of the same be postponed until the first day of the next session. This is the recommendation of the committee. The two bills will go on the Calendar and come up for consideration.

Mr. MORTON. The recommendation as to the postponement will be opposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be placed on the Calendar. When called up, the question can be considered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 930) to establish a post-road in the State of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) authorizing Lieutenant Theodore B. M. Mason, of the United States Navy, to accept a silver medal from the King of Italy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave to withdraw the papers of Thomas F. Wilde. It is a pension case. A bill for this man's relief has passed, and the papers are needed before the Commissioner of Pensions. I move that they be withdrawn and sent to the Commissioner of Pensions, who has to act on them.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO SILVER COINAGE BILL.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 263) to amend the laws relating to legal tender of silver coin; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Mr. SAMUEL S. COX, a Representative from the State of New York, Speaker pro tempore during the present absence of the Speaker.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 634) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint-stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," approved March 2, 1867.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. S. HOLMAN of Indiana, Mr. J. H. BLOUNT of Georgia, and Mr. HENRY WALDRON of Michigan managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue;

A bill (H. R. No. 1539) to authorize the construction of a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River from some feasible point in Buffalo County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Winona County, in the State of Minnesota;

A bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3740) providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 3741) amending an act incorporating the proprietors of Glenwood Cemetery;

A bill (H. R. No. 2043) to improve the law in relation to dower in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 3745) to prevent the sale and use of adulterated and explosive illuminating oils and other fluids; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) providing a commission to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, if there be no further morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That being the unfinished business is before the Senate and will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I will make a very brief statement of the principal points of the bill.

The amount appropriated in the bill proposed by the House of Representatives is $4,090,112.83, to which the Senate Committee on Appropriations has added $998,096.35. The total amount of the bill as recommended by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is $5,088,209.18. In order that the Senate may see how this compares with a few former years, I will say that in 1873 the total appropriation for the Indian service was $6,196,362.91; in 1874, $5,505,218.90; in 1875, $5,538,274.87; for the current fiscal year, $5,360,554.55, a little less than the previous year. The amount of this bill as reported by the Senate committee is $272,345.37 less than that for the current year.

The Senate will see that there has been a constant diminution in these bills since 1873. The reduction made by the House on the appropriation for the current year is $1,270,441.72, and I will call the attention of the Senate for a single moment to the principal items constituting that reduction.

The item for pay of superintendents, agents, &c., is omitted in the bill, amounting to $213,300. The superintendents, agents, &c., were omitted on the theory of the House that the Indian Department should be abolished and that the duties now performed by the officers, agents, and employés in that Department should be performed by the officers and soldiers of the Army; so that, although there is an apparent diminution of $213,300 for that item, I think when we come to the examination of it we shall find that it is only apparent; that it will not be an actual reduction of expenditures to anything like that extent. Another reduction of $50,000 made by the House is in the item for the Apaches of Arizona and New Mexico, the House appropriating $400,000. Last year the appropriation was $450,000, and there was a subsequent deficiency—two deficiency bills passed in fact—one for $25,000 and the other for $50,000; making the entire appropriation, including the deficiency bills, $525,000 last year. The House bill makes the sum $400,000 for the coming year; but I have put the deduction made in the House bill at only $50,000.

In the item for the Arapahoes and Cheyennes, there is $50,000 reduction. To that the committee have agreed. The Crows the House have reduced $32,000. The treaty provides for the payment of a certain amount, $10 for each Indian roaming, to the Crows. The River Crows have been transferred to the Crow agency; but there has been no addition made in the House bill for the expenditures, so that that amount of $32,000 was dropped out entirely by the House. Then there is omitted an item for the Assinaboines, $30,000; for the Gros Ventres, $35,000; making a total of $65,000 reduction for those two tribes. The House bill transfers the Assinaboines and Gros Ventres to the Sioux agency at Fort Peck; but the amount appropriated for the Sioux, as well as these two tribes, is no larger than last year; so that this reduction is simply a failure to appropriate $65,000 that was last year appropriated to these two tribes.

There are several small items which I will not now mention which will be observed as we consider the bill. For the Sioux of different tribes the House bill has reduced the appropriation from the expenditure of last year $247,000. That is a discretionary amount, and the committee will submit to the Senate for its consideration what shall be appropriated. For the item of incidental expenses in the States and Territories, the reduction of the House bill is $237,500; in transportation there is a reduction of $79,000.

These are the principal items of reduction as against the appropriation of last year made by the House bill. Now I will state the additions proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

They have re-instated the superintendents, agents, and employés, as now provided for by law, and have recommended for that service $210,300 additional to the House bill. For the Blackfeet, Bloods, and Piegans they have recommended an additional $5,000. There is an unratified treaty with these tribes providing that they shall be paid $50,000 a year, which they have received for several years past; and although we are not bound by the treaty that has undergone all the formalities to pay this full amount, the committee believe that it is the best policy to do so, that the Indians need it, and that it will be impossible to explain to them why it has not been done, and that the failure to appropriate the $50,000 will cost us more than we shall save by it.

There are several other little items of appropriation which I shall not now mention. For the Crow Nation we appropriate $30,000 in addition to the House bill, which, as I said, is provided for by treaty, we agreeing to pay them $10 for each Indian roaming, there being about three thousand of them. We have added to the appropriation for the Sioux $284,800, and have annexed to that appropriation certain conditions requiring a relinquishment of certain claims made by them, which I will not now stop to consider.

For the Apaches of Arizona and New Mexico we have added $50,000. I have already stated that for the current year they had $525,000. It has been found to be the smallest amount that the Department could get along with and preserve the peace. The House has appropriated, as I have already stated, $400,000. We have added $50,000 to it, making it $450,000 for the next year as against $525,000 expended in the current fiscal year.

We have also added in our recommendations $72,000 for transportation, which brings it to the amount actually expended for transportation this year, the House bill being $72,000 less than the amount actually expended the current year.

For general incidental expenses, subsistence, &c., in the States and Territories the committee have added $237,500, making in all an addition of $998,096.35. I have not stated all the small items.

Mr. President, I will not take the time of the Senate further in a general statement with reference to the bill; but I think that the pressure of the public business justifies me in saying that this bill ought to be passed before the Senate shall adjourn to-day, and I shall refrain talking as much as possible, and will ask that the Senate remain in session until the bill be concluded. There are but three or four questions that will elicit discussion, and it seems to me that they should elicit but little. We have but ten days until the close of the fiscal year, and really but five practical working days, for, I take it, the next week we shall hardly be able to do more than we did last week, for similar circumstances to those which then prevented a quorum will transpire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be acted on in their order as the reading of the bill progresses.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in section 1, line 7, after the word "namely," at the end of the first clause of the bill, to strike out the words "for the."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the Senate by unanimous consent pass over all the amendments beginning in line 8 down to line 143, on page 7, until we come to the proposition in the latter part of the bill providing for the abolition of the Indian Bureau, so that these may be reserved for discussion when we settle that point, and then the whole question can be taken together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments from line 8 to line 143 will be passed over for the present if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the amendments only be reported, unless some one asks for the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent, the formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the amendments taken up in their order.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment was in line 166, in the appropriation for the Blackfeet, Bloods, and Piegans, to increase the item, "for this amount to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may, from time to time, determine, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in every other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement," from $45,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 226, to increase the appropriation "for this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the support and civilization of the Chippewas of Lake Superior, to be expended for agricultural and educational purposes, pay of clerk and necessary employés, purchase of goods and provisions, and for such other purposes as may be deemed for the best interests of said Indians," from $15,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 440 the following additional paragraph among the appropriations for the Crows:

For eighth of ten installments, to be used by the Secretary of the Interior in the purchase of such articles as from time to time their condition and necessities may indicate to be proper, the sum of $10 for each Indian roaming, as per same article, $30,000.

Mr. HAMILTON. I hope the Senate will not concur in that amendment. It is so indefinite and so uncertain whether those Indians, roaming over the plains there, will ever get anything under any administration of the Government that it looks like throwing money away. I do not believe that any officer of the Government now has an assurance that appropriations of a similar character have been properly applied hitherto. There is no way to test it, there is no way to find out. It is a lump-sum, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, to be paid $10 a head to Indians roaming. Nobody knows where they are. Nobody knows whether they are ever communicated with at all. Nobody knows whether they have ever received one sixpence, and I believe it is pretty well understood over the country that hitherto they have not received anything; that the agents employed by the Government have absolutely pocketed nearly all the money that has been appropriated in that way. The Secretary of the Interior possibly cannot help it; he is not in a condition to watch these agents and see what they do with the money appropriated out of the public Treasury. He does perhaps the best that he can under the circumstances; but I am not sure that the late Secretary of the Interior or Commissioner of Indian Affairs did even that. The supposition is I believe pretty general that they did not do their duty in that respect. We may expect better things now. But I think that when money is appropriated by the hundreds of thousands of dollars for the purpose of aiding Indians roaming over the plains in the western country some steps ought to be taken first to collect those Indians and get them on reservations. Whenever you have got them where you can count them and where provisions can be issued to them and checks held upon the agents of the Government, it may be time then to consider whether the Government will appropriate money for their support. As it is now, I hope the Senate will not consent to such a waste of public money. I hope the amendment will be non-concurred in.

Mr. WINDOM. A word or two, Mr. President. If we are to refuse to appropriate for the Indian service because it is not always honestly conducted, I regret that the Senator from Texas has chosen these particular Indians for the purpose of enforcing that rule. The Crow Indians have been friendly for many years. They have stood as a wall of protection between the hostile Sioux and the whites. We are under treaty stipulations with them to furnish them this amount of money, and it seems to me it would be in bad faith on the part of the Government to fail to do it. The treaty provides that for Indians roaming we shall furnish $10 per head, and these are all Indians of that character. It is not professed that they are engaged in agriculture. Very many of them are engaged as scouts in assisting us, and have rendered very great service to the Government. I hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS. Is this provision confined to the Crows?

Mr. WINDOM. This provision is confined to the Crows—friendly Indians.

The question being put on the amendment, the ayes were 7.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. I am quite certain that the Senate does not understand this provision. Last year we appropriated for the River Crows and the Crow Nation proper $165,000. This year by the House bill $100,000 only is appropriated. We have added from the Senate committee $30,000 in compliance with a treaty; and it does seem to me that it is very hard upon these friendly Indians, one hundred and fifty of whom, I am informed, are to-day marching with our troops to suppress the hostile Sioux, that we should decline to comply with what is understood by them and us to be an obligation on our part.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of my friend from Minnesota if any one or more of these Indians should cease to roam at any time, what would be his or their condition in reference to subsistence? Is there other provision for those who do not roam; or is this only an encouragement to roam?

Mr. WINDOM. The provision of the treaty is: for Indians roaming, $10 per head; for those engaged in agriculture, $20 per head. But as they are all, or nearly all, roaming, we have given them the round sum provided for by the treaty. I will read it:

> And, in addition to the clothing herein named, the sum of $10 shall be annually appropriated for each Indian roaming, and $20 for each Indian engaged in agriculture, for a period of ten years, to be used by the Secretary of the Interior in the purchase of such articles as, from time to time, the condition and necessities of the Indians may indicate to be proper.

Now, sir, why should we select these friendly Indians, who have furnished soldiers to aid the United States, who have maintained the peace with us, who are really the best of the uncivilized Indians, when we propose to and will be compelled to appropriate for those not so friendly, but merely because we have to do it to keep the peace?

Mr. President, I think the Senate will not vote down this proposition. I am sure it would be an act of injustice to do so.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Kernan, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Sherman, Stevenson, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Cockrell, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Paddock, Robertson, Wallace, and Whyte—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Clayton, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Thurman, and Wadleigh—35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriations for the Dwamish and other allied tribes in Washington Territory, in line 478, after the word "physician," to strike out the words "who shall furnish medicines for the sick;" so as to make the clause read:

> For seventeenth of twenty installments, for the employment of a blacksmith, carpenter, farmer, and physician, per fourteenth article of same treaty, $4,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriation for the Makahs, in lines 586 and 587, after the word "physician," to strike out the words "who shall furnish medicine for the sick;" so as to make the clause read:

> For seventeenth of twenty installments, for the employment of a blacksmith, carpenter, farmer, and physician, per same article and treaty, $4,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 646, in the appropriation for the mixed Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheepeaters, to increase the amount "to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may from time to time determine, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement," from $15,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso in lines 723 to 726, at the close of the appropriations for the northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes:

> Provided, That said northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes shall remove to their reservation in the Indian Territory before the delivery of the supplies appropriated for by the foregoing clauses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the close of the appropriations for the Osages the following proviso, to be lines 762 to 776:

> Provided, That authority is hereby given for the use of $200,000 of the funds of the Great and Little Osage tribe of Indians, now in the Treasury of the United States, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the erection of buildings, opening farms, fencing, digging wells, support of schools, purchase of agricultural implements, farm stock, seeds, fruit-trees, necessary household articles, merchandise, and subsistence supplies, and in the employment of the necessary labor to carry out the objects herein specified: Provided further, That Indian labor shall be preferred and be employed in all cases, except where skilled labor shall be found necessary: Provided further, That if deemed proper by the Secretary of the Interior, a sum not exceeding $50,000 of the above amount may be expended as a per capita payment to the Osages.

Mr. COCKRELL. As this amendment affects the question of transfer, I would ask the Senator from Minnesota if it had not better be reserved and voted upon with the other amendment?

Mr. WINDOM. This amendment does not, I think, affect the question of transfer.

Mr. COCKRELL. It places this matter under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior; and if the Bureau should be transferred, I suppose it would be placed under the charge of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no special objection to reserving it. We could change that word, however. I think we had better refer to it again and change that word in case the Senate should agree to transfer the Department. The Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, will make any explanation of the amendment necessary, if any is desired. We can refer to this again in case the action of the Senate should agree to the transfer.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether he thinks it is a proper thing to do to fritter away the little patrimony of this tribe of Indians now in the Treasury of the United States at interest. It is so small, $200,000, that if it is to be expended in this way it will hardly be felt at all. It is true, if properly expended, it would amount to something; but if it is followed every year by a similar appropriation, very soon they will have nothing in the Treasury at all. If the interest that accrues upon this fund every year is expended properly, those Indians may be after a while civilized by the use of this fund alone. Of course an appropriation of $200,000 a year would soon squander it, considering the want of success we have had in the management of these things for the last eight years. With all the exertions of the Administration, and with all the support that has been given to its policy by the Congress of the United States, very little progress has been made. I do not think that anybody, either in the Senate or out of it, has been more friendly to the policy chalked out by the present Administration for the management of the Indians than I have been. I have supported it all the way through since I have been here, and I should like to support it as long as I remain in the Senate; but if there is not some improvement made in the management of Indian affairs, nobody will be able to support the policy a great while longer, I think. This fact has caused the country pretty generally to insist upon a change from the Interior Department to the War Department, so that the control of these matters may be placed in the hands of officers of the Army of the United States. I think it would be unwise to make the transfer, and I therefore move to non-concur in this amendment making an expenditure of $200,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurrence in the committee's amendment. The Senator can reach his object by voting against the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say only one word with reference to this amendment on page 32. These Osages are the wealthiest tribe of Indians in the United States. They have, or will have within a very few years, a sum approaching nearly $10,000,000.

Mr. HAMILTON. The interest on that, if the Senator will allow me, will suffice for them.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. They have recently removed from the State of Kansas to the Indian Territory. During the years 1874 and 1875 they have received $200,000 for the purpose of building houses and improving farms, &c., at their new homes, and a great number of them are now living in houses.

I am not prepared to disagree with the Senator from Texas as to the way in which a portion of this money has been expended hitherto, but a portion of these Indians now living in houses, the remainder of them desire also to have homes and houses and improved farms. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommend that this sum be devoted to that purpose; and if it is honestly and carefully expended, I have no doubt that this is the proper thing to do. If we have not faith that the Secretary of the Interior will see that this money is properly expended, then we ought not to appropriate it. If we have faith that he will do so, I think it is a proper disposition of the large fund which these Osage Indians are entitled to receive. It takes money out of the Treasury, of course; but it is a part of their own fund, which now amounts, I believe, to about eight or nine hundred thousand dollars in the Treasury, and it certainly would be better for these Indians to receive this sum of $200,000 now than to receive a much larger sum at some future time, providing, of course, that it is faithfully expended. I believe it will be expended right. The committee believe it will be, and have recommended the appropriation.

Mr. KERNAN. I should like to know whether the Indians themselves ask that this sum of their own money shall be expended in this way?

Mr. ALLISON. They do, and urge it very strongly. They urged it in their council. I have sent for the printed document which covers this case.

Mr. KERNAN. I remember that some time ago I learned from some person who professed to have an interest in the Indians in that country, who was going to the Secretary of the Interior, that before they were removed they had churches and schools. I believe that is correct, is it not?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. Their agent was here, and asked me to go with him to the Department. He complained that while they did support their own institutions, and while the treaty provided that they should have their own clergymen and teachers as they desired, they were deprived of that privilege; that while their own money supported them they were compelled to have others dictate what class of schools they should have, as well as what teachers and what class of persons should instruct them religiously. Of course, if they ask for this expenditure of their own money—they having become somewhat civilized—I shall not object to it; but I think we should carry out the treaty, and permit them, themselves, to have, so far as they indicate, the teachers, both secular and religious, that they prefer, taking those to suit the various views of the various parts of their tribe. My friend says they ask for this appropriation, and if they do, I have nothing to say in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Here is a petition of the Osages addressed to the House of Representatives—a printed document, Miscellaneous Document No. 112. The Osages state at some length the reason why they desire this appropriation to be made out of this fund.

Mr. KERNAN. Is it signed?

Mr. ALLISON. It is signed by at least forty members of the tribe.

Mr. BOGY. The Osage Indians are really entitled to some $6,000,000 or $8,000,000. I have been looking through the report to find the evidence of the fact which I state. I cannot find it in this report; but the fact is as I state. By the treaty made with them a good many years ago they obtained the sum of $1,600,000 for a portion of their reserve. By a treaty made subsequently, the remainder of their land was to be sold by the United States, and the net proceeds carried to their credit. That would yield an amount of money from perhaps $5,000,000 to $6,000,000; and yet our Indian affairs are so badly administered that I can find no evidence of this fact anywhere. We are called upon to make an appropriation of $200,000 out of the Indian fund, when, as far as we know, there is no evidence that there is any such sum due these Indians. We know as an outside fact that this or a much larger sum is due to them; but if there is evidence of it, I should like to have the fact pointed out by some persons who are more familiar with it than I am. I have not been able to find it yet. If it be true that this large sum of money is due to these Indians, it should draw interest, and 5 per cent. upon $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 would be more than enough for this purpose without any appropriation. There is something lacking, something wrong, some looseness in this thing somewhere.

Again, the same sum of $200,000 was paid to them last year for the same purpose—to promote agriculture and to facilitate them in their agricultural pursuits. The report which was made and which went before the Committee on Indian Affairs shows very plainly that the largest portion of this money was misspent. The largest portion of it, I have no doubt, was directly robbed and did not go to the benefit of the Indians. It is the loosest report, the loosest account, and the most unsatisfactory, which could be imagined. I would be perfectly willing to give to all these Indians, the Osages as well as the other Indians, a fair proportion of the money arising from the sale of their lands to promote them in the pursuit of agriculture, to civilize them, to educate them, to benefit them in any way; but the manner in which it has been done heretofore has resulted only in enriching the agents who are among these Indians, and the Indians have derived no benefit from the money at all, or very little.

I opposed this amendment before the Committee on Indian Affairs because I was not satisfied that the money heretofore had been well spent, but, on the contrary, I was well satisfied it had been misspent. The committee made no effort to satisfy me that I was wrong, and I feel it my duty now to oppose this appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will turn to page 169 of the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, he will see the amount there placed to the credit of the Osages, $721,000.

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir; I am familiar with that already. That states that there is a certain amount of money due to the Indians which amounts to some $1,600,000; but I said there are many hundred thousand dollars due these Indians, and this report does not show it. I give in round numbers the sum which is due to these Indians for what was called their diminished reserve by treaty made with them many years ago. It is $1,584,000. They retained a large portion of their reserves which, since that time, has been sold under a law I believe perhaps introduced by my friend from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] which authorized us to sell Indian lands in Kansas and place the proceeds to their credit. The amount of lands thus undertaken to be sold amounted to millions of acres, but nowhere can we find the evidence of that fact. Even this item of $1,584,000 is in this book as a mere memorandum. Why is it not carried regularly there? It is a mere memorandum, an addendum at the foot of the book.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations after line 761.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriation for the Qui-nai-elts and Quil-leh-utes, in line 886, after the word "physician," to strike out the words "who shall furnish medicine for the sick."

Mr. KERNAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill why those words are to be stricken out? Does not the physician furnish the medicine; or is some one else to do it?

Mr. WINDOM. I will answer the Senator from New York that it has been the practice for the physician to furnish the medicine, but the Indians have complained that when the physicians furnished medicine out of their own salary it was of an inferior quality, and it is proposed by the Department to furnish it out of their contingent fund instead.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriations for "Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux, State of Nebraska," in lines 1087 and 1088, after the word "Secretary," to strike out the words "having jurisdiction of Indian affairs" and insert "of the Interior;" in line 1089, after the word "agriculture," to strike out the words "one hundred and fifty thousand" and to insert "four hundred and thirty-four thousand eight hundred;" and after "dollars," in line 1091, to strike out "Provided, That none of said sum shall be paid to said Indians until they shall cease their hostilities against the white people;" so that the paragraph will read:

For seventh of thirty installments, to purchase such articles as may be considered proper by the Secretary of the Interior, for Indians roaming and for Indians engaged in agriculture, $434,800.

Mr. WINDOM. Before taking the vote on this amendment, I am instructed by the committee to modify the amendment by striking out in line 1090 the word "thirty-four" and inserting "nineteen;" so as to make the sum $419,800.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. KELLY. I should like to hear the Senator state the reason why he desires the proviso to be stricken out.

Mr. WINDOM. We have made a general provision for all the sums appropriated at another point, in the amendment following on page 46. The same proviso is substantially in the amendment on the next page.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 1094, after the word "amount," to strike out the words "to be expended in the purchase of beef, flour, bacon, sugar, and coffee in proportionate quantities for 35,000 persons;" in line 1096, after the word "subsistence," to strike out "of" and insert "including;" so as to make the clause read:

For this amount for subsistence, including the Yankton Sioux and Poncas, and for purposes of their civilization, $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1098, after the word "that" to strike out the words "no portion of the appropriation hereby made for feeding the Sioux Indians, parties to the treaty of April 29, 1868, shall be available or be used for that purpose unless the said Indians shall first agree to relinquish all right and claim to any country outside the boundaries of the permanent reservation established by the said treaty for said Indians;" and to insert in lieu thereof the words:

None of said sums appropriated for said Sioux Indians shall be paid to any tribe thereof while said tribe is engaged in hostilities against the white people; and only one-half of the last-named sum shall be available, or be used for the subsistence of said Indians, unless they shall first agree to relinquish all right and claim to any country outside the boundaries of the permanent reservation established by the treaty of 1868 for said Indians; and also so much of their said permanent reservation as lies west of the one hundred and third meridian of longitude, and shall also grant right of way over said reservation to the country thus ceded for wagon or other roads, from convenient and accessible points on the Missouri River, in all not more than three in number; and unless they will receive all such supplies herein provided for, and provided for by said treaty of 1868, at such points and places on their said reservation, and in the vicinity of the Missouri River, as the President may designate: And provided also, That no further appropriation for said Sioux Indians for subsistence shall hereafter be made until some stipulation, agreement, or arrangement shall have been entered into by said Indians with the President of the United States, which is calculated and designed to enable said Indians to become self supporting: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may use of the foregoing amount the sum of $25,000 for the removal of the Poncas to the Indian Territory, and providing them a home therein, with the consent of said tribe.

Mr. KERNAN. I should like to have some information in regard to this amendment. I suppose we appropriate this money in pursuance of some treaty which would bind us to do it. It says:

That none of said sums appropriated for said Sioux Indians shall be paid to any tribe thereof while said tribe is engaged in hostilities against the white people.

That is all right. It also says:

And also so much of their said permanent reservation as lies west of the one hundred and third meridian of longitude, and shall also grant right of way over said reservation to the country thus ceded for wagon or other roads, from convenient and accessible points on the Missouri River, in all not more than three in number.

What I desire to know is whether this is a pure gratuity for which we require them to give us some of their land until they give us grants of right of way, or whether it is money that we are to appropriate anyhow to make them give up the Black Hills country, as it is called, and grant rights of way, or whether we are making a new agreement to be binding by an act of Congress. I think we should know that.

Mr. WINDOM. It is a fact, I will say to the Senator from New York, that the $1,000,000 appropriated is a pure gratuity. We are under no treaty obligation whatever to grant it. But it is not only a gratuity but a necessity, I suppose. The committee have thought that if we were compelled to grant this large amount of money for their subsistence, they should be required to relinquish this outside territory, a small portion, comparatively, of their reservation. We make this gratuity on the condition of that relinquishment, hoping it will preserve the peace in that country. I think that answers the point suggested by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriation for the S'Klallams, line 1179, after the word "physician," to strike out the words "who shall furnish medicine for the sick."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriation for the Tabequache, Muache, Capote, Weeminuche, Yampa, Grand River, and Uintah bands of Utes, line 1200, after the word "Secretary," to strike out the words "having jurisdiction of Indian affairs" and insert "of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 1228 the following item:

For colonizing and supporting the Wichitas and other affiliated bands:

For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may, from time to time, determine, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriation for the Winnebagoes, in line 1258, after the word "Secretary," to strike out the words "having jurisdiction of Indian affairs" and insert "of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1340, to increase the appropriation "to subsist and properly care for the Apache Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico or Arizona" from $400,000 to $450,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. Before we pass from that page I desire to make an amendment not included in the printed bill, recommended by the committee. I move to strike out the proviso on the last line of the fifty-fourth page. The proviso now requires that all Indians shall share alike per capita in the goods, provisions, and other articles herewith furnished. The treaties under which this money is paid to these several tribes thus congregated at Fort Peck do not provide that they shall be paid equally, and it would be a violation of the treaty to retain the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to strike out the proviso to the appropriations for the "Sioux at Fort Peck Agency, the Assinaboines, and the Gros Ventres," in the following words, from line 1325 to line 1329:

Provided, That all and each of said Indians shall share alike per capita of the goods, provisions, and other articles herewith furnished.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1347, after the words "Secretary of," to strike out "War" and insert "the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1380, to increase the appropriation "to carry on the work of aiding and instructing the Indians of the central superintendency in the arts of civilization, in providing clothing, food, and lodging for the children attending school, in caring for the orphans, the sick, and the helpless, and in assisting the Indians generally to locate themselves in permanent homes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life" from $15,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1387, to increase the appropriation "to subsist and properly care for the Kansas Indians, including agricultural assistance, pay of employés, and for such other beneficial objects for the tribe at large as their necessities may indicate to be proper" from $5,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1395, to increase the appropriation for "clothing, food, agricultural implements, and seeds for the Modoc Indians that have been removed to and are now residing within the Indian Territory" from $5,000 to $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1412, to increase the appropriation "for the necessary expenses of transportation of such goods, provisions, and other articles for the various tribes of Indians provided for by this act" from $147,000 to $219,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I submit from the committee another amendment to this paragraph. In line 1414, after the word "transportation," I move to insert the words "involving an expenditure of more than $1,000;" so as to read:

Provided, That hereafter contracts for transportation involving an expenditure of more than $1,000 shall be advertised, and let to the lowest bidder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert the following paragraphs after line 1419:

For this amount, for the support of industrial schools and other educational purposes for the Indian tribes, $40,000.

For this amount, for the civilization of Indians and for their assistance in agricultural operations, $20,000.

That the sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated out of the fund provided by article 1 of the treaty with the Great and Little Osages, proclaimed January 21, 1867, known as the civilization fund, for the education of forty youths, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior from the various Indian tribes in the United States; said youths to be educated at some one or more of the various institutions of learning in the United States which may be willing to receive and provide for them.

For continuing the collection of statistics and historical data respecting the Indians of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 1469 to 1491, as follows:

For payment of the expenses incurred by Silas H. Sweatland, special agent, sent by the Indian Department to make a per capita payment to the North Carolina Cherokees in 1869, to the following-named persons, to wit:

Samuel W. Davidson, $213.30.
Henry Smith, $554.66.
Henry Smith, $301.
N. J. Smith, $100.
James W. Terrell, $60.
A. McCallum, $100.
John Gray Bynum, $867.50.
J. D. Abbott, $175.
M. C. King, $212.03.
M. L. Brittain, $232.
Scroop Enloe, $125.35: Provided, That the amounts due J. D. Abbott, M. C. King, M. L. Brittain, and Scroop Enloe be charged to the fund held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior for the North Carolina Cherokees.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota, who reported this bill, to the amendment now pending, striking out that part of the appropriation designed for payment to the agent of the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina. It was stricken out by the committee, I understand, for want of some information on the subject. I am informed that the amount which is appropriated in the bill as it came from the House was incurred under a law of the Government; that bills have passed the Forty-second and Forty-third and the present Congress appropriating this amount, and that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs allowed the justice of the claim. I think the clause ought to be restored to the bill; but if we have no opportunity of doing so now, I make this explanation in order to ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to it.

Mr. WINDOM. The amendment striking out these various provisions was made for three reasons: One is that the committee had no means of ascertaining the facts with reference to the provisions; the second, that they are private claims; the third, that this is a bill for the next fiscal year and these appropriations are to pay back-dues, and should really be in the deficiency or sundry civil bill. Since the committee reported upon this point I have examined the facts, and am of the opinion that it is very clearly proven that the claims are right, but they ought to be in another bill rather than in this.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 1491 the following clause:

That the balance of the fund of the Eastern band of Cherokee Indians appropriated by the act of March 3, 1875, shall, upon the 1st day of July, 1876, be placed to their credit upon the books of the Treasury Department, and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to use annually for educational purposes among said Indians so much of the principal of said fund as, with the interest annually accruing thereon, shall amount to $5,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the gentleman having in charge this bill whether it has been customary to pay interest upon money retained in the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians? It seems to me that, unless there is some requirement by treaty stipulations that we should pay interest on funds kept in the Treasury for their benefit, the amendment would be wrong. I do not know what the provisions of the treaty are with reference to it. I ask for information.

Mr. WINDOM. We have paid interest on this fund until the last year. I will state that the fund named in this amendment arose under the treaty of 1835 set apart by the act of 1849 to those Indians who did not remove West, bearing interest at 6 per cent. The per capita fund was $53.33, and interest accumulated until the whole amount in the Treasury was about $100,000. There has been expended under the act of March 3, 1875, about $55,000 for quieting the title to their lands in North Carolina. The Indians are in as good condition as the white citizens around them, and need this fund for school purposes. It was a fund provided for their removal, a per capita appropriation for that purpose. Those of them who did not go are entitled to have the money appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is upon that fund, as I understand, that we propose to pay them interest?

Mr. WINDOM. It is.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Has it been customary to pay interest on that fund, do I understand the chairman to say?

Mr. WINDOM. Interest has always been paid, until last year, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think we have interest account enough in this country. I am not in favor of paying interest unless there is some treaty stipulation requiring that we shall retain the money in the Treasury and pay them interest.

Mr. WINDOM. I think if we do not pay them the interest we ought to pay the principal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If we owe them anything I am perfectly willing to pay it. I believe the Government ought to pay its honest debts, and if we owe the Indians we ought to pay them; but I am not disposed to see an accumulation of funds in the Treasury of this country bearing interest paid to Indians or paid to anybody else.

Mr. WINDOM. This was money received into the Treasury from the sale of lands belonging to these Indians at the time of their removal. It has remained in the Treasury ever since. Interest was paid on it until last year, and it seems to me we should pay the principal at once or pay the interest. It is better for the Indians, in the opinion of the Department, that we should pay a portion of the interest and a portion of the principal to maintain their schools.

The question being put upon the amendment, a division was called for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the question is put, if we are to divide, I should be glad to have the Senator in charge of this bill point out the provisions of the treaty under which this money was received into the Treasury. If it has come in merely in the ordinary way of business and is merely on deposit there, there is a great deal in what the Senator from Delaware says, I think, about our obligation to pay interest; but if it has come in under a treaty stipulation by which we are to hold it in trust for them and have the use of it, then we ought to pay interest, which is merely another name for the use of the money. My vote would be guided by knowing the exact terms upon which we hold this money.

Mr. WINDOM. I have not the treaty before me, but I shall have it in a few moments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator perhaps can state the nature of it.

Mr. WINDOM. It is the treaty of 1835. I will state again more distinctly than I did before, that when provision was made for the removal of the Cherokee Nation west of the Mississippi a certain number of them remained at home. An appropriation of $53⅓ per capita was made for their removal. Those who remained behind have been held to be entitled to the money from that time until this, and it has been in the Treasury, and until last year we have paid interest upon it. This proposition is to pay a portion of the principal with a portion of the interest for the maintenance of their schools. I understand that those Indians were in excellent condition; as stated by the Department, in as good a condition as the surrounding white people almost; but this fund belongs to them, amounting to about $44,000. I believe they are highly civilized Indians, living upon farms.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is this the article of the treaty?

The Cherokee Nation of Indians, believing it will be for the interest of their people to have all their funds and annuities under their own direction and future disposition, hereby agree to commute their permanent annuity of $10,000 for the sum of $214,000, the same to be invested by the President of the United States as a part of the general fund of the nation.

Mr. WINDOM. No; that is not it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And—

Their present school fund, amounting to about $50,000, shall constitute a part of the permanent school fund of the nation.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to be conceded on all hands that this money is due. The amount of it was appropriated last year for a certain purpose, and only so much of it was used for that purpose; the balance remains in the Treasury; and as a matter of course the Government of the United States, according to its usual policy with Indian tribes, has paid interest on this money.

Mr. WINDOM. I will state to the Senator that the act adjusting this removal, passed in 1848, provides for interest on this amount. I have it before me.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have always paid interest to the Indians. In that respect the case is different from an ordinary claim against the Government of the United States which we are supposed to be ready to pay on sight. With the Indians it has been the policy of the Government always, if possible, to retain their money and pay interest on it, on the ground that they are not in proper condition to manage their own affairs.

Mr. WINDOM. Perhaps the quickest way to settle the question will be to read from the act of 1848, page 264, of the ninth volume of the Statutes:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War cause to be ascertained the number and names of such individuals and families, including each member of every family of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, that remained in the State of North Carolina at the time of the ratification of the treaty of New Echota, May 23, 1836, and who have not removed west of the Mississippi, or received the commutation for removal and subsistence, and report the same to the Secretary of the Treasury; whereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to $53 33 for each individual ascertained as aforesaid, and that he cause to be paid to every such individual, or his or her legal representative, interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on such per capita from the said 23d day of May, 1836, to the time of the passage of this act, and continue annually thereafter said payment of interest at the rate aforesaid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It seems to be provided for by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 1504 and 1505, as follows:

For incidental expenses of the Indian service in the following States and Territories.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

General incidental expenses of the Indian service:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service, subsistence, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, and for educational purposes and pay of employés, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the States and Territories following.

And in line 1514, after "Arizona," to strike out "twenty" and insert "sixty-five;" in line 1515, after "California," to strike out "thirty" and insert "sixty;" in line 1516, after "Colorado Territory," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" in line 1516, after "Dakota Territory," to strike out "five" and insert "twenty;" in line 1517, after "Idaho Territory," to strike out "three" and insert "ten;" in line 1518, after "Montana Territory," to strike out "five" and insert "twenty;" in line 1519, after "Washington Territory," to strike out "five" and insert "twenty-five;" in line 1520, after "Wyoming Territory," to strike out "one thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand;" in line 1521, after "Nevada," to strike out "five" and insert "thirty-five;" in line 1522, after "New Mexico," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "forty;" in line 1523, after "Oregon," to strike out "ten" and insert "forty-five;" after "Utah Territory," in line 1523, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" in line 1524, after the word "all," to strike out "one hundred and twelve thousand five hundred" and insert "three hundred and fifty thousand."

Mr. WINDOM. The committee modifies the Montana appropriation by striking it down from $20,000 to $16,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified, if there be no objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In these various items I observe a large increase by the committee. For instance, in Arizona I see the committee have struck out $20,000, which was deemed sufficient by the House, and inserted $35,000; and so in all the other items there has been a large increase. I should like to hear the necessity for it. I want to vote for proper amendments, but I do not like to vote in the dark.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator will be entirely satisfied with the amendments when I explain them to him. He will see by a reference to the bill as it came from the House that it provides for general incidental expenses only. It allows for general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Arizona, $20,000; but there are a great many expenses in these Territories that are not properly incidental. If the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate had confined themselves to that which was purely incidental, and there had been no other service to be provided for, they would have made the appropriation less than it came from the House; but, if the Senator will look at the amendment following the general heading, he will find that it provides not only for general incidental expenses but for "subsistence, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes and sustain themselves by the pursuit of civilized life, and for educational purposes, and pay of employés," &c.

I will say to the Senator that for a very large number of Indians there is no other appropriation whatever than that under this head. For instance, in Arizona, those at the Colorado agency, at the Pima and Maricopa agency, and one or two other agencies; in California at the Hoopa Valley, Round Valley, and Tulare and Mission agencies; in Nevada at the Nevada agency; in New Mexico at the Abiquiu, Pueblo, and Cimarron agencies; in Oregon at the Grande Ronde and Siletz agencies; in Utah at the Uintah Valley agency; and in Washington Territory at the Colville and Nisqually agencies, there is no provision whatever except under this general head. If we confined the bill to what is strictly incidental expenses we should fail to provide, as we have done for many years past, for a large number of Indians in these Territories. The total appropriation, I will say to the Senator, is no larger than it was last year; I believe it is just the same.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know anything personally about the Indian service. All the information I have in reference to it is derived from comparing the appropriations of the last year with former appropriations, four, six, or ten years back. I remember that prior to 1860, and about 1860, the appropriations for this service never exceeded $3,000,000; and yet of late years the appropriations have run up some years to $7,000,000 for this service. Now there are not so many Indians in all this western country as there were formerly, and yet there is more than double the expenditure in appropriations for the Indian service. I have no personal knowledge of the necessities of the service. If there is an absolute necessity to make this appropriation in order to maintain the existence of these tribes that I think have been unduly oppressed very often, then I am willing to vote for it. If, however, it is true, as has been alleged, that much of the money which has been appropriated of late years has been squandered or gone into the pockets of men that are professing to be Indian agents and others having some supervision over them, then I think the less money we appropriate the better. If it is not to benefit the Indians, if it is simply to enrich the agents, then I think the time has come when we ought to cease making any of these appropriations.

I think at any rate there must be something wrong in this constant increase of the Indian service while the Indians are decreasing in numbers. They ought to be in a better condition when you take into consideration the vast expenditure of money by this Government for their benefit, and yet there has been a large increase in the last fifteen years in the money expended, till it has reached more than double the amount expended fifteen years ago for the Indians. I think there must be something wrong, and always when these Indian bills come up I feel some hesitation about voting for them because I fear that somebody is to gobble up the money which we design for the benefit of the Indians. I do not think these funds have been sufficiently protected in the past, and I think the committee in assuming the responsibility to appropiate so much money out of the public Treasury ought to be exceedingly careful that they provide the proper guarantees that it shall go to the Indians and not go into the pockets of private individuals.

Mr. WINDOM. A single word in answer to the Senator from Delaware. This little appropriation of $350,000—small in proportion, I mean, to the number of Indians concerned—is all there is for aiding in the subsistence of 22,170 Indians; and, in addition to that, from this fund are furnished employés, teachers, &c., for bands of Indians numbering 95,000 souls. It seems to me to be a very small appropriation. It is true we have no treaties with any of these tribes, but it is simply a small amount to enable us to give them some assistance.

The Senator compares the last two or three years with several years ago—1860. It is true that the Indian appropriations were smaller fifteen years ago than they are now; but nearly the entire difference may be accounted for by two appropriations, one for the Apaches in Arizona and New Mexico and the other for the Sioux. Those two appropriations alone—which I am sure we did not make at that time—amount to $2,000,000; and if you deduct those two appropriations from this bill you will have the bill about where it was at the period to which the Senator refers—1860. I think we have not been extravagant in our Indian appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware is quite right in saying that the mystery of the Indian Department is past finding out. During the past three years I have endeavored, with what little attention I could give to the matter, to understand the system and the method upon which these appropriations were made, and have followed the committee as far as possible in the recommendations they have presented to the Senate. I have heard a great deal, and all of us I suppose agree, that this is a year for the exercise especially of economy and retrenchment in our public affairs; not perhaps for parsimony, but certainly for frugality and for economy. In the bill that is before us the House of Representatives have submitted appropriations which comply in every respect, as I understand, with the treaty stipulations under which we are engaged with the various Indian tribes under our control. It appropriates two or three million dollars for the general purposes of the Indian service, to furnish them with agricultural implements, to educate them, to make them Christians and philosophers, to enable them to become civilized, and to perfect them in the arts of modern life. After having made those appropriations, then we have the extraordinary provision here of a miscellaneous item that goes on and specifies, for the same objects that have heretofore been appropriated, some eighty to one hundred thousand dollars more; and as if "miscellaneous" was not sufficiently comprehensive in its terms, was not enough of a drag-net to bring in everything that could possibly be comprised in the Indian service, we have what are called "the general incidental expenses of the Indian service" to the amount of between four and five hundred thousand dollars more.

Mr. WINDOM. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. INGALLS. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars more, which is an excess of $238,000 above the amount appropriated by the House of Representatives.

I object to these "miscellaneous" and to these "general incidental expenses of the Indian service" items in the first place, because there is no limitation whatever upon the authority of the Indian Department in the disbursement of these funds. It is an appropriation of money without limitation as to the objects for which it shall be disbursed. After we have complied with all our treaty stipulations, after we have named every Indian tribe from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the British Possessions to the Gulf of Mexico, and given them two or three millions of dollars, then, as if that were not enough, the committee must come in with a miscellaneous appropriation giving a large amount more; and as if that were not sufficiently comprehensive, then a general incidental expense account giving $350,000 more.

I do not expect that anything I can say will produce any effect whatever upon the action of the Senate in regard to the Indian appropriation bill. I have tried the experiment in previous sessions of Congress and have learned that it is entirely futile and nugatory; but I cannot allow this bill to pass without entering my protest against the enlarged appropriations that have been made by the committee of the Senate, on the ground, in the first place, that I believe they are entirely superfluous and unnecessary; that they are uncalled for by treaty or by any obligation we are under to these tribes; and in the second place, because the result is to confide to the Indian Department the disbursement of a large sum of money without any control whatever on the part of the Legislature.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the bill under consideration, as framed by the House of Representatives, proceeds upon the theory that the Indians will be transferred to the charge of the War Department. The amendments of the Senate Committee on Appropriations proceed on the theory that the Indian Bureau will remain a part and parcel of the Interior Department. It is assumed by the House of Representatives, and they act upon that theory, that if the Indians are transferred to the control of the War Department, the expenses will be very largely decreased in this, that the agents and various employés, superintendents, &c., will be taken from officers of the Army not otherwise employed, and who can be spared by the War Department for the discharge of these duties, now drawing their pay as Army officers and doing nothing in the interest of the Government. That is the theory on which the House bill evidently has been framed. As to the special item now under consideration, it may be that it will not make much difference, but I am speaking of the entire framework of the bill.

There is a provision in this bill—and I see that the Senate committee has proposed to strike that out—transfering the control of the Indians to the War Department. Upon that we have not as yet acted. If we sustain the action of the House, if we sustain the bill as it was presented to us by the House, then I apprehend that the careful consideration given to the bill by the House in view of this transfer will be found to be right. If, however, that is voted down and the Bureau is left under the control of the Interior Department, then it may be that these amendments of the Senate committee are right.

So, then, the question of amendments turns to a very great degree, it seems to me, on what action the Senate may take upon the transfer of the Indians to the War Department; and that is the great question presented by this bill, upon which I do not care now to speak, because we have not reached that point. I only wish to say now in support of what was so well said by the Senator from Kansas, that the management of this Indian Bureau, the absorption of such vast sums of money, the wonderful increase in the expenses of this Indian Bureau from its organization so far back as we have any knowledge of it, I believe in 1832, down to 1875, are things that I confess I cannot find out and do not understand. I therefore think that the real question at last will come up (and that perhaps will settle the entire action on this bill) on whether the House bill is right or the Senate committee is right, whether the Indian Bureau shall remain in the Interior Department or be transferred to the War Department.

I do not myself like the expression "general incidental expenses of the Indian service." It may mean anything, everything, or nothing; it is altogether too broad, too indefinite to be fastened down. Here is in Arizona an increase from $20,000 proposed by the House to $65,000; in California, from $20,000 to $60,000; in Colorado Territory from $3,000 to $5,000; in Dakota from $5,000 to $20,000; and so it goes along all the way through. I admit that the Senator from Minnesota has made a statement in regard to this which may be satisfactory, but I should like to know where all this money goes to? I think there should be in all these things something more specific, something more definite, when the money of the people goes out, than this general head "general incidental expenses of the Indian service." Especially where a bill has been presented by us to the House, in which the House in one case say that for Arizona, for example, $20,000 is enough and that is increased more than three times, up to $65,000, and so all the way through. In New Mexico, for example, the increase is from $15,000 to $40,000; in Oregon, from $10,000 to $45,000, four and a half times the amount that the House thought necessary. I should prefer to have some more definite explanation before I can vote for the amendment.

I agree with the Senator from Kansas—and my whole course in the Senate has shown it—that I do not propose to be parsimonious in legislation, but I do propose to be economical; and when I vote for the expenditure of the people's money I want to know why I vote for it. If I am made satisfied that an appropriation of money is necessary for the general welfare of the country, I will vote it as freely as any other man; but I must be convinced of that fact, and where I see such startling differences as are exhibited by this item between the view taken by the House of Representatives and that taken by the Senate committee, I prefer that some one should rise here and explain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment from line 1503 to line 1525.

Mr. WINDOM called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the vote is taken I will attempt again very briefly to explain why these items are so much larger than those contained in the bill as it came to us, and I hope that I may have the attention of the Senate while I attempt to do so.

The bill as it came to us undertook to provide, as we understand, for strictly and technically "incidental expenses" only, and did not provide, certainly did not provide funds, for subsistence, for aiding the Indians, and for the other purposes for which they have received aid several years past.

The Senator from Kansas leaves the impression upon the Senate, or at least upon my mind, that we have in other parts of the bill provided for the same Indians that we are now seeking to appropriate these items for. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that the Indians who are to receive this fund have no other appropriation whatever; and although, as he says, we have appropriated from one end of the continent to the other for Indians under treaty stipulations and in various ways, we have in no other part of the bill, except possibly for general educational purposes, made any provision whatever for the subsistence of the Indians in the various Territories mentioned here.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is the case, why are not these appropriations made specifically for the Indians for whose benefit they are designed, so that we may know for what purpose the money is to be used? What I object to particularly is the fact that here is a great fund that is appropriated in general terms and that can be applied at discretion by the Department of the Interior, or by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, not only to those Indians who the Senator says are the ones to be benefited, but for any other purpose whatever. If there are tribes of Indians that require appropriations, why not name those tribes and say for their benefit such and such a sum of money?

Mr. WINDOM. I presume that might be done; but the amount for each Territory is by no means large, and it is deemed better, and I myself believe it is better, to place this fund in the hands of the Interior Department, specifying what amounts shall be used for each Territory. We have no estimates before us of the exact amount necessary for each tribe. I think that sometimes they may need more for one tribe and sometimes more for another in a Territory, and my impressions are that this is the best way to make the appropriation.

Mr. INGALLS. I believe that irregularities, not to say corruptions, are inseparable from the appropriation of money to be employed at discretion without any legislative control.

Mr. WINDOM. There is no more discretion in this than there is in almost every appropriation that is made in the Indian list. I know it is a difficult bill in which to make appropriations. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that there is no service more difficult than the Indian service, and there is nothing I have more regretted than that I have been compelled ever since I have had the honor to be in the Senate to have charge of the Indian appropriation bill. I have been compelled to listen annually to this diatribe against the rascality of Indian officials. Now, sir, I believe if you will examine the purchases made by the Indian Department, the expenditure of money made by the Indian Bureau, you will find that money has been as economically expended as it has been in any other Department of the Government. I believe that it has been demonstrated elsewhere by the production of the receipts and expenditures, the payments for articles of supply to the Indians, that the money has been as carefully and as economically expended as anywhere else.

I have no doubt that there may be, and is, rascality at distant frontier posts; and I want to say further that I believe that when years ago this Indian Bureau was organized and it was provided that an agent should receive but $1,500 per annum, it must have been contemplated that he would steal, and I think he has stolen less than was reasonably to have been expected under the circumstances. The idea that a man competent to manage hundreds of thousands of dollars, on the distant frontiers, surrounded by the circumstances which surround the Indian agents, should be expected to leave civilization, to abandon the comforts of civilized life, and take charge of a fund of that kind, living among savages, and receive $1,500 a year, is simply absurd; and yet I believe that a great deal that is said about stealing in the Indian Department is purely gratuitous. I have had a great deal to do with that Department during my services in Congress, having been for six years chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the other House, and since that time having had charge of this bill in the Senate, and I have taken the trouble to scan carefully the expenditures of money, and I do not believe that these general charges that the Indian Department in all its branches is more dishonest than any other department are sustained by the facts. If my honorable friend from Kansas will take the reports of expenditures under this very clause which he says is so loose, with no responsibility anywhere, he will find, I think, every dollar of last year's appropriation accounted for and just what has been done with it. Although the appropriations are general, there is a specific account rendered, and he can ascertain where every dollar of the $350,000 of last year went. Now, I think it will create great disturbance in all these Territories, it will work a great injury to the service if we fail to appropriate this money.

Having said this much, I submit the matter entirely to the discretion of the Senate. If they think we ought not to appropriate this money, if they think that, having hitherto for many years past furnished supplies to Indians numbering some 22,000, we should suddenly cease those supplies in all these Territories, upon the Senate be the responsibility, and not on me. I have endeavored to make the statement as plain as I could.

Mr. INGALLS. I think in this year of commercial depression the Indians ought to practice economy as well as white men, and if we are compelled to reduce our expenses they ought to be compelled to diminish theirs in proportion. But the Senator certainly cannot accuse me of having made any general allegation of rascalities or irregularities in the Indian service. I was merely calling attention to what seemed to me to be an extraordinary looseness in the method of appropriation; and, with his permission, I now desire to call his attention to the amendment on page 58 of this bill under the general head of "miscellaneous." The committee have appropriated $83,000 in excess of what was reported by the House. In line 1420 it reads:

For this amount, for the support of industrial schools and other educational purposes for the Indian tribes, $40,000.

I ask the Senator to state to me what limitation there is upon that appropriation, in what Territory it is to be expended, to the education of what tribes it is to be applied, or what necessity for the appropriation exists.

Mr. WINDOM. There is no limitation as to what Indian tribe it shall be applied to. It is for the educational service, as I understand.

Mr. INGALLS. Then under the head of "general incidental expenses of the Indian service," on page 62, we have again "for educational purposes and pay of employés" in the different Territories, these amounts aggregating $350,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I stated expressly when on my feet before that that was the only case in which any provision was made for the Indians contemplated in the amendment under discussion.

Mr. INGALLS. But this will certainly apply to them.

Mr. WINDOM. I said that was the only exception; that it did so far as an educational appropriation was concerned apply to them also. The $40,000 which the Senator has referred to is a general appropriation for that purpose. Hitherto there has been a fund, just how large I cannot state, arising out of the sale of the Osage lands. The treaty with the Osage Indians provided that certain funds received from the sale of their lands should be used for general educational purposes applied to all the Indians. Owing to the fact that lands in that locality have ceased to sell as formerly, that fund is not now available, and there is this appropriation in order to prevent the schools from being discontinued. It is not limited, I will say frankly to the Senator, but is a general appropriation for the Indian educational service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon this amendment. The Secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sherman, Windom, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Booth, Christiancy, Clayton, Cockrell, Cooper, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Whyte—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry, Gordon, Harvey, Howe, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, West, and Withers—27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following proviso, from line 1526 to 1533:

Provided, That none of the appropriations herein or hereafter made under the head of incidental expenses of the Indian service shall be expended in payment of employés in said service, but the same shall be used for annuity goods, subsistence, agricultural implements, for educational purposes, and for repairs of flour-mills, saw-mills, and other agency buildings, and incidental transportation, and for no other purposes.

The amendment was rejected,

Mr. WINDOM. I suppose a vote will be in order in the Senate on this proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment can be renewed in the Senate. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be read.

The next amendment was in section 2, to strike out the words "and the warriors thereof," between the words "tribe" and "shall" in line 8; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That no supplies or annuity goods for which appropriation is made in this act shall be issued to any band or tribe of Indians while the same may be engaged in hostilities against the United States or in depredations upon settlers; nor shall any sum of money appropriated by this act for any tribe of Indians for whom a reservation of territory shall have been made be paid to them or expended for their benefit, unless such tribe shall remain peaceably within the limits of the territory assigned to them, unless absent by the consent of the agent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby abolished, and the salary heretofore paid to such officer shall cease, and the offices of superintendents of Indian affairs, clerks to the same, of agents and special agents, interpreters, inspectors, and all other employés of the Indian Bureau, are hereby abolished; and the salary heretofore paid to such officers respectively shall cease; and the duties now intrusted to and performed by said officers, of every kind and description, shall be performed by officers, soldiers, and employés of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War; and they shall receive no additional pay by reason of the performance of the duties aforenamed, thus transferred to them, other than the pay they may receive as officers and employés of the Army; and the Secretary of War shall assign them their duties in connection with the supervision, control, and management of Indian Affairs under such regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the execution of all laws and parts of laws applicable to the management and control of Indian affairs and of matters arising out of Indian relations is hereby transferred to, and placed under, the control of the Secretary of War, who is hereby empowered to, and shall, exercise the same authority in the control of all Indian affairs heretofore had by the Secretary of the Interior; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize an increase in the number, rank, pay, or allowances of officers of the Army in excess of that now provided by law, and its provisions shall be applicable to officers on the retired list of the Army, who, when on such duty, shall receive full pay and allowance of the rank in the regular Army held by them at their retirement, as prescribed by law for officers on the active list.

Mr. LOGAN addressed the Senate in favor of the amendment and in opposition to the section. Having spoken for some time,

Mr. WINDOM, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) I move, with the consent of the Senator from Illinois, that the Senate take a recess from five o'clock until half past seven.

Several SENATORS. Why not from now?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want any recess on my account.

Mr. WINDOM. My motion is that at five o'clock the Senate take a recess until half past seven.

A division was called for.

Mr. WINDOM. I think we had better have the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. It is absolutely necessary that we devote more hours to work if we expect to get through before the close of the fiscal year.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] being called away, and having to leave just at this particular time, I am paired with him on this question. He would vote for the recess, and I should vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. I ought to state that the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] is compelled to be absent.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Caperton, Clayton, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Johnston, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Patterson, Sherman, Windom, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wallace, and Withers—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Howe, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Key, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Ransom, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, and Whyte—35.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the Senate will remain in session, then, until we finish the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no doubt the Senate is very impatient and very anxious that I should get through. I know I am. I do not expect that my asking the attention of the Senate to what little I may say hereafter will be of any use; but I do ask those who desire to hear to give me their attention for a few minutes and I shall be through.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, this question is the one referred to by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] a short time ago as the important question presented by this bill; and although I am satisfied that the Senate is not desirous at this time of hearing any extended argument in connection with this bill, yet I deem it my duty to give my reasons why the proposition as presented by the House should not be agreed to by the Senate.

I desire to call the attention of Senators to that which has transpired in reference to changes or attempted changes from the civil departments to the War Department. I have always, since I have had a voice in the Congress of the United States, protested against the civil department of the Government going into the hands of the Military Department. I believe that they are and ought to be entirely separate and distinct; their services are of an entirely different character, and their education leads them in entirely different lines.

I find that this winter an attempt was made not only to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and that was done upon the theory of economy, but also to transfer the Pension Bureau to the War Department, and following that would come the transfer of the Land Office to the War Department. This is merely the entering-wedge for the destruction of what originally was called the Home Department, or Interior Department of this Government. In order to verify my statement so far, I have here a report made to the House of Representatives by a committee of that House not only in reference to transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department, but also in favor of transferring the Pension Bureau to the War Department. That branch of the subject I will not discuss any further than to call the attention of the Senate to the fact. The conclusion of the report, made by Mr. JENKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, is this:

It is suggested the duplicate labor performed by the finance division of the Pension Bureau and the pension agencies can be done by the Paymaster's Department of the Army with very little addition to its present force. The duplicate labors now performed by the War Department and the Surgeon-General's Office can be avoided, with all the correspondence pertaining to it, by the transfer of the Bureau of Pensions to the War Office, and greater efficiency, integrity, and intelligence can thereby be secured.

There is the attempt made by the House of Representatives this winter not only to transfer, as I said, the Indian Bureau but the Pension Bureau to the War Department; and I have heard it suggested—I know it would follow also if this should be accomplished—to transfer the Land Office to the War Department, thereby giving the War Department in fact the administration of a great portion of the civil affairs of this country. Against that I enter my solemn protest. If I shall draw a line of economy even between the civil Department that has charge of the Indian affairs and the War Department which will not be very favorable to the War Department, in what I wish to say to the Senate in reference to the management of the affairs of the Indian Department, I now give notice to Senators who differ with me on this question, if they think I am in error in any statement that I make, it will not interfere with me one particle if they will stop me and ask me for the proof, for I have right here before me documentary evidence, commencing at the foundation of this Government down to the present time, in reference to the management of Indian affairs.

Sir, I feel compelled on behalf of the honor and good name of our Republic as a great civilizing and enlightening agency, on behalf of humanity and Christianity, to oppose the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department with all the power and ability I possess. Did it involve only a question of preference between two Departments of our Government, as to which should exercise certain functions, I would not trouble the Senate with any remarks upon the subject, but content myself with simply casting my vote. Did it involve only a question of dollars and cents, I should feel far less solicitude in reference to the final result than I do.

But, sir, attempt as we may to reduce it simply to a question of economy, a thorough examination of the principles involved must show to every thinking mind that something of much greater importance to civilized humanity and enlightened nations is connected with the decision of Congress on this question.

It is true, sir, that in making laws in reference to the administration of the affairs of Government it is our duty always to consider the expense as one and an important item in making up our decision, yet it by no means follows that the plan involving the least expenditure in dollars and cents is the proper one to be selected; in fact, as a rule there are questions of still greater importance connected with all laws of a general character. In erecting our public buildings permanency and usefulness are of more importance than the saving of a few thousand dollars with the loss of these items. In providing means for the administration of our laws equity and justice are to be considered first. When our unity as a nation and the great principles of freedom were at stake, we did not even stop to consider the cost in order to know how to cast our votes. If, therefore, it should appear upon a thorough examination of this subject that important principles in reference to civilization and the efficiency of our Government as a great agent in civilizing and enlightening mankind and elevating the standard of morality are involved, surely no one in this Senate will contend for a moment that these should be sacrificed in order to save a few thousand dollars. I am in favor of economy, and would be glad to see the eyes of our people opened to the folly of the extravagance that prevails in our midst; nay, more, sir, I believe it is the duty of our legislators and public officers to set the example of prudence and economy both in their public capacity and private life. But even placing this matter on the basis of dollars and cents, the result is not in favor of the passage of this act, as I shall attempt to show before I am through.

It has been stated that the opposers of this transfer, in their great anxiety to protect and civilize the Indians, have forgotten that the right and lives of our border settlers are also involved. I am fully aware, Mr. President, that these brave and hardy pioneers who have pressed onward to the borders of civilization have rights and interests equal to, and I may say superior to, those of the Indians, which it is our duty to protect and foster; and in opposing this act I conscientiously believe I am doing this more effectually than I would be in advocating it. This I propose to bring more fully to your notice before I conclude.

Other questions of more or less importance are also involved, for it is far more complicated as regards its connection with other subjects than we are disposed to believe until we have thoroughly studied it. But, sir, the great question raised by this proposition, and the one which, in my opinion, overtops all the rest, is this: Shall we as a nation cut short our work of civilization in reference to the Indians? Shall we by our action say to the world that we abandon all hope of elevating and fitting them for that standard in life the God who made them designed them to enjoy? Shall we confess our inability as a nation, notwithstanding the vast resources at our command, to civilize a few thousand degraded wards completely under our control, and thus condemn them to extinction? Shall we, as the representatives and legislators of the great Republic of the world, a Christian nation, while singing centennial anthems of praise, decide in the most solemn and official manner possible that the God to whom we ascribe all our glory and prosperity has created other peoples only for the purpose of destruction and extinction, and that we, as a nation, are the divinely appointed agency to execute the sentence of annihilation?

Mr. President, this may appear somewhat strong language to use in reference to an act which seemingly proposes only to transfer certain duties from one Department of Government to another; yet, sir, I firmly believe I do not exaggerate the importance of the questions involved, for such I am forced to believe will be the result if the principles contained are allowed to work out fully their legitimate effects.

I will therefore present my reasons for this opinion, and address myself first to the discussion of this point as the one of first and chief importance. If the facts and reasons adduced show that I am correct in this respect, then the matter is settled with every one who has any regard for our honor as a nation, and all secondary considerations sink into insignificance.

It is evident to every one who is at all acquainted with the history of our relations with the Indians that our contact with them must result in one of two things—their civilization or extinction. No one in his senses doubts this; even the most ultra advocate of this change now before us will admit this without a single dissenting "if." As all look forward with certainty to the extinction of the buffaloes now roaming over the great plains of the West, with equal certainty do they look forward to and prophesy the extinction of the Indians unless by some means they are civilized and localized. There is no middle ground, and it is impossible there should be. Civilized and savage life cannot exist together; the former must always overcome the latter by force or example. Even if civilized, they may ultimately be absorbed into the Caucasian race, and thus at last the distinctions between the two be lost; but uncivilized, they must soon be swept from the stage of existence by the onward progress and inherent vitality of their white brethren.

This being admitted—and no one will attempt to deny it—any action on our part which indicates an abandonment of the attempt to civilize them is virtually saying to the world that we hand them over to their fate—extinction. The enlightened nations of earth and the humane portion of our own country can look upon such action on our part in no other light, and they will put no other construction upon it. The responsibility of the care, protection, and well-being of these unfortunate races is thrown upon us; no other nation, however willing they might be to do so, can or would be allowed to assume it. It is ours and cannot be shifted or avoided, and whether we desire it or not we must face this responsibility and will be held accountable by the enlighted world for the result. Why, sir, this responsibility was assumed at the time we obtained a foothold on this continent, not by action only, but was directly avowed in the early days of Plymouth Colony. Most of the early royal charters and patents issued for British North America professed, as one chief object in view, civilizing and Christianizing the Indians or infidels, as they were then termed; as for example that of James I to the Nova Scotia colony, (1621;) the preamble of the Pennsylvania charter; the first royal charter of the Massachusetts Bay colony, (1628.)

This you will find in Halkett's History of the Indians. I read from pages 239 and 240:

> Almost all the early royal charters and patents issued for British North America professed, among other things, the object of converting the Indians. King James I, in the Nova Scotia patent, (1621,) declared, in reference to those countries "as are either inhabited or occupied by unbelievers, whom to convert to the Christian faith is a duty of great importance to the glory of God." In the preamble to the Pennsylvania charter, during a subsequent reign, it is also stated to be a principal object "to reduce the savage natives by just and gentle manners to the love of civil society and Christian religion."

So I might read further Halkett's work on Indians, which is the best authority in this country. In reference to every charter and every beginning in this country there was a provision that the Indians should be treated with for the purpose of civilizing and Christianizing them.

When we come to the annals of our present Government we find it repeated directly or indirectly under every administration, as I will show before I get through, both by the official expression and assurances of those in authority and by the laws relating to Indian affairs. By every one they were treated in a manner showing that civilization and Christianization were the intention of our Government.

Hear, for example, the words of Washington to the Cherokee delegation, which you will find in McKinney's Wrongs and Rights, volume 2, page 131:

> I am highly satisfied with the confidence you repose in me and in the United States as your friends and protectors. We shall indeed rejoice in being the instruments of the Great Master of breath to impart to you and to your whole nation all the happiness of which your situation will admit; to teach you to cultivate the earth and to raise your own bread as we do ours; to raise cattle; to teach your children such arts as shall be useful to them; and to lead you by degrees from one information to another in order not only to better your situation on this earth, but by enabling your minds to form a more perfect judgment of the great works of nature to lead you to a more exalted view of the Great Father of the universe. Rest, therefore, on the United States as your security against all injury.

That was the declaration of George Washington, the Father of his Country, to the Cherokee Nation, promising them the faith of this country to teach them to till the soil and to educate and teach them a religious life.

Mr. President, by examination you will find that this idea of civilizing and Christianizing the Indians is not of recent date. It is not of a few years past. It commenced with the first organization of this Government. It commenced with the first dawn of the liberty of this country, and has been followed down by every fair-minded and honest administration from the time of the organization of the Government to the present day.

Washington goes on further, and in order to show them his good faith in making this pledge he added at the conclusion:

> I shall subscribe my name to this talk, which shall be written in your book in order to be preserved among you as a witness to our transactions together, and to which you may have recourse in the future.

Washington says "It shall be written; my name shall be signed to this talk; you shall have it as a guarantee for all time to come of the good faith of this Government."

The same principle was asserted by General Knox in 1789 while Secretary of War, and again and again by Presidents and Secretaries from that time to the present; by the ordinances and laws of our Government, directly or indirectly, from the ordinance of July 12, 1775, that of January 27, 1776, and the ninth article of the Confederation of 1777 down to this time; and, as President Polk in his message to Congress December 5, 1848, solemnly declares, this has always been the policy of the United States.

For the truth and verification of what I say I cite you to the Reports of Committees, second session Twenty-seventh Congress, 1841-'42, volume 4, No. 854, page 96, which I have here. Also, the Reports of Committees, first session Twenty-third Congress, 1833-'34, volume 4, No. 474, page 93. Also, Executive Document, second session Thirtieth Congress, 1848-'49, volume 1, page 919. I will not detain the Senate by reading extracts, but call their attention to my statement, which they will find verified in these documents.

We cannot therefore expect now, when we have grown strong and mighty and the Indians few and comparatively weak, to avoid this responsibility or shield ourselves by flimsy excuses from the censure of the enlightened world if we are derelict in our duty in this respect.

But, sir, I am met at the very threshold of this discussion with this question: "Does transferring the care of the Indians from the Interior to the War Department necessarily indicate or imply our abandonment of the attempt to civilize them?" The question is a pertinent one; in fact it presents fairly and squarely the chief point at issue; and in reply I answer most emphatically, yes. The heart of every Christian and philanthropist which has beaten high with the hope of redemption which seemed to be dawning on these poor wretches will answer yes with a sigh of grief and sorrow. And those of other countries, who have been watching with deep interest and solicitude the progress of the present system, will affirm the decision.

If nothing more could be urged than the very name of the Department to which this bill proposes to transfer their care, it alone would be sufficient to indicate at least our abandonment of the peace policy; and to counteract and remove this belief, if even incorrect, would require much explaining and time and tend to depress and check all private efforts to ameliorate the condition of this people. Therefore, unless the reasons for the change are urgent and very important, the step would be unwise even on this account alone. Add to this the fact that the Interior Department, where this care now resides, is felt to be and in fact is the peace Department, the domestic or Home Department as it was formerly usually termed, and the contrast becomes still stronger, the opinion and belief suggested by the name of the former become intensified. And will not all be justified in believing, despite all our protestations to the contrary, that the transfer from a peace Department to a War Department signifies a change from a peace to a war policy? Sir, it is reasonable that such should be the effect on all minds.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to understand the Senator from Illinois. I understand his position is that a transfer of this Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department would be a transfer from a peace policy to a war policy.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I said.

Mr. MAXEY. I wanted to understand the position.

Mr. LOGAN. I said that would be so understood by everybody, and I think I will show it before I am through. That is the way I understand it.

But even the surface indications, if I may be allowed to use a mining term, do not stop here. Why change unless the present plan is a failure? Why abandon the system which is understood to be in part at least experimental, unless unsuccessful? Will not this action of necessity indicate to the world that the experiment has been a failure? It is impossible that it should do otherwise. This must be admitted. Will we be justified in abandoning after such a short time an experiment which at the outset was understood to require a generation to test it? No matter how much we may flatter ourselves, another system may be successful. The plan now in operation was long ago suggested by Christians, philanthropists, and statesmen, and hence is entitled to a fair and thorough trial even if it were but an experiment only, which it is far from being. But not one of those noble humanitarians expected that a few short years would suffice to test the plan. I might fill page after page with quotations in proof of this assertion; but this is unnecessary, as all who are acquainted with our dealings with the Indians and the efforts to civilize them are fully aware of the fact. An abandonment, therefore, of the system must be taken either as evidence of an entire want of capacity on our part to understand the difficulties we have to contend with and the principles embraced in the effort, or, as is far more likely, that we abandon the attempt to civilize them. Unless the enlightened portion of mankind look upon us as utterly void of statesmanship, they must look upon the passage of this act as a giving up of all hope of civilizing these unfortunate races and abandoning them to the sure work of decay and extinction. This would surely be a sad comment on the work of American statesmen in the hundredth year of our existence as a Christian nation. Nevertheless it would be just.

But, sir, the world may be wrong and Galileo right. Surface indications may not be a true index of what is hid beneath. Let us therefore probe the crust and see what lies below. In other words, let us see whether this action would in fact be an abandonment of the peace policy and of the hope of civilizing the Indians. To answer this point fully in all its bearings would require a volume instead of a single speech, hence we can only glance at some of the chief items embraced, and some of the most prominent facts bearing upon it. These are to be found, first, in the spirit of our institutions, as shown by the plan of our Government, its Constitution, laws, &c.; second, in the opinions of enlightened Christians, philanthropists, and statesmen, based upon a knowledge of the Indian character and of civilized and savage life; and, third, in the experience of the past in reference to the point in controversy.

As regards the first we may safely assume as granted that one great object of our present form of government was to ameliorate the condition of mankind by affording protection to life and liberty and ample opportunity for the pursuit of happiness; and this not to a selected few, but to all who come within the pale of our authority and under our protection. As I have already shown, the Indians are expressly included as proper subjects of this humane object; it having been avowed again and again by our authorities in treaties made with them and in our statutes that one chief object of our control over them is to elevate them to that standard where they can be admitted to share in the administration of government. War (although sometimes unavoidable) and all that pertains to war, as a rule, are inimical to freedom, happiness, and moral progress; and the restraining influence of military power (although sometimes necessary) is detrimental to the progress of civilization and to all that tends to elevate and ennoble man in a moral and intellectual point of view. Hence it has always been a leading principle in the administration of our Government to have as little recourse to military control and restraint as possible. And why? Because it has been felt, not only by our wisest statesmen and best men, but by the nation at large, that military control is a hinderance to civilization and enlightened progress. Our great Magna Charta of liberty has always been felt to be the right of civil authority to rule and control the military; or in other words, the subserviency of military to civil authority. It is a principle lying at the very basis of our institutions that the military arm of the Government is to be used, so far as relates to internal affairs, only as an aid in executing civil authority. Nowhere in our fundamental laws or plan of organization does the idea once enter that military power shall be used as a primary means of administering justice and equity any more than it does that it should arrogate to itself legislative power. It follows, then, that it is contrary to the very spirit of our institutions to make use of the military arm as a primary means of civilizing the Indians and leading them up to the standard of citizenship. There is no more reason to assume that such an idea is embraced in the organization and fundamental laws of our Government than that emigrants who come to this country should be placed under its care until they have attained the rights of citizenship. The difficulties to be encountered in the one case may call for more frequent use of military power than the other, but this does not change the principle or justify or excuse the this be true—and I see not how it can be successfully refuted—then, sir, seeking to transfer a portion of the civil administration of the Government to the Military Department is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the fundamental principles upon which our Republic is based.

If adoption of a different policy.

It may be said that no one expects or desires by this transfer to check the efforts to civilize the Indians; that because the aid of military power is so often necessary, we may as well place the whole matter in the hands of that Department. Without agreeing to the latter part of this proposition, which I am far from doing, let us for the moment admit it. Will even this justify us in this transfer, when the spirit of our institutions and the fundamental principles of our Government cry out against such an act? Hear the words of a venerable Christian and philanthropist who on account of his probity and knowledge of Indian history and character was commissioned by our Government to examine into their condition and make suggestions in reference to their civilization. I refer to Professor Morse, of Massachusetts, who made an examination in 1820, and in 1822 a report to the War Department, which I hold in my hand. On page 95 of his report Professor Morse says:

> The work of educating and changing the manners and habits of nearly half a million Indians as they are now situated [1822] is acknowledged to be great, arduous, and appalling. My enthusiasm on this subject does not blind me to the difficulties and obstacles which are to be overcome. But these difficulties are not insurmountable. The labor required is usually proportioned to the magnitude of the good to be effected as its reward. But even such obstacles and such labor, formidable as they are, intimidate and palsy not the heart and arm of the man of real courage in the cause of humanity.

I have not time to give copious extracts. You will find in this report, which is very elaborate, more information in reference to Indians than you can gather from almost any other source. It gives his travels for years among them and his association with them. This report was made to the Secretary of War at the special solicitation of the Department.

These were brave words from a brave and noble heart; words which to-day are echoed by thousands, yea, tens of thousands, of Christian and philanthropic hearts which are palpitating with fear lest Congress, by one rash act, shall blast all their hopes of elevating this outcast race, and thus in part erase the dark stain which blots the pages of our history.

Listen to the words of General Knox, first Secretary of War. You will find the quotation that I make from General Knox in Reports of Committees, Twenty-seventh Congress, second session, 1841-'42, No. 854, page 2. I have the book here. General Knox says:

> That the civilization of the Indians would be an operation of complicated difficulty, that it would require the highest knowledge of the human character and a steady perseverance in a wise system for a series of years, cannot be doubted. But to deny that under a course of favorable circumstances it could be accomplished is to suppose the human character under the influence of such stubborn habits as to be incapable of melioration or change, a supposition entirely contradicted by the progress of society from the barbarous ages to its present degree of perfection.

Sir, the difficulties in our way, the expenses necessary to be incurred, form no excuse for violating the fundamental principles of our Republic. Why, sir, it was this spirit of obedience to civil authority that relegated to civil life a vast army of conquering heroes with a speed and quietude that amazed the nations of the Old World. And to-day, while it cherishes and looks with pride upon the brave officers and soldiers of our Army as they stand as the nation's guard upon our outposts and frontiers, yet it watches with jealous eye every attempt at encroachment by military upon civil authority.

A second class of evidence which goes to show that transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department would be an abandonment of the peace policy and an end to all hope of civilizing these wild races is to be found in the opinions of enlightened Christians, philanthropists, and statesmen based upon a knowledge of Indian character and civilized and savage life. My time will permit me to give but a hasty glance at the voluminous testimony embraced in this division of the subject. And before introducing this it is proper to state that one additional link will be necessary in order to render it directly applicable to the point at issue, but as this can be better presented after this testimony is introduced than now, I will defer it to that point in my argument.

President Monroe, in his inaugural address in 1821, uses this language:

> For the territory thus ceded by each tribe some reasonable equivalent should be granted to be vested in permanent funds for the support of the civil government over them, and for the education of their children; for their instruction in the arts of husbandry, and to provide sustenance for them until they can provide it for themselves. My earnest hope is that Congress will digest some plan founded on these principles, with such improvements as their wisdom may suggest, and carry it into effect as soon as it may be practicable.

President Monroe in his message at that time to the Congress of the United States laid down the very proposition that is to-day being carried out by the present Administration in administering the Indian affairs. It is well for Senators to remember that during these declarations made by these Presidents and Secretaries that I have quoted the Indian Department then was under the War Department, and it was with a desire that it should be changed from the War Department and placed upon a peace basis and a peace policy that the Presidents made these declarations for the last three-quarters of a century to the people of this country.

Washington's words to the Cherokee delegation already quoted, likewise those of Rev. Jedediah Morse, and General Knox, all agree in sentiment, looking to education, instruction in the arts of husbandry, and moral influences as the only means by which the Indians can be civilized. Mr. Halkett, an English gentleman, relative of Sir Alexander Selkirk, who traveled extensively among the Indians of British America and the United States and who had studied more thoroughly than any other man of his day all that had been said and done on this subject, after pointing out the causes of failure, gives it as his opinion that instruction in agriculture and industrial arts combined with education is the only way to accomplish this work. The same views are substantially given by Thomas L. McKinney, who was for some length of time Indian Commissioner under the War Department, and who has written some of our best works on Indian history.

But why select a few names out of the hundreds who have expressed similar views. President after President, Secretaries, Commissioners, and agents have endeavored to impress this upon the Government from the days of Washington to the present. Christian bodies and societies, especially the Moravians, who first put the plan in practice in our country, have urged the same thing. But, sir, the evidence on this point does not stop here for the Government in various Indian treaties and acts of Congress has directly or indirectly expressed the same view, as may be seen by reference to the treaties with the Creeks, August 7, 1790, and Cherokees, July 2, 1791, the acts of March 1, 1793, and March 30, 1802, and numerous acts and treaties from that time to the present. (Report of Committee, No. 474, first session Twenty-third Congress, volume 4, page 4, 1833-'34.) We may therefore take for granted as admitted in reference to the Indians, as history shows to have been true with reference to other savage nations, that instruction in the arts of husbandry and education is the primary and indispensable agency in civilization.

It was perhaps unnecessary to produce any evidence on this point, but I have presented it briefly, as it affords, as I conceive, a conclusive argument why the Indian affairs should not be turned over to the War Department.

If the slow process of instructing them in the arts of husbandry and in educating them affords the only method of civilizing them, it is apparent that the primary object for which the Indian Bureau was established is wholly incompatible with the duty of the officer and soldier. Neither husbandry nor anything that appertains to it forms any part of their education, and if they become husbandmen and teachers they are no longer officers and soldiers except in name. If they employ others to do this work, this of itself is an admission of their incapacity for the duties required and that they have been placed in wrong hands. Why, sir, if it is admitted that the Indians can be civilized only by the means mentioned—and no one will deny it—it seems to me there are no grounds for discussion as to where this Bureau properly belongs; and placing it under the War Department can signify nothing less than an abandonment of the peace policy and a giving up of all hope of civilizing these unfortunate beings. It will not do to say we do not intend this when our actions contradict our words. A nation is judged by its actions rather than by its words, and when we say a certain course only can result in civilizing them and follow another, it is rightly presumed we intend another result.

What does our past history teach us in reference to the capacity of the War Department to accomplish this work which we have always professed to be the object of our dealings with the Indians?

This Department has had the charge and care of Indian affairs from the organization of that Department, August 7, 1789, until 1849, when the Bureau was transferred to the Interior Department by the act establishing that Department.

If the arguments which are presented in favor of this transfer have any force in them, then in the fifty years that this Department had the chief or entire control, some reasonably adequate policy ought to have been presented and some decidedly marked progress in the solution of the great problem made, radical errors ought to have been ascertained and corrected and abuses prevented. I wish Senators to bear in mind that I am not now contending that the present system is by any means perfect or without serious defects or that there are not abuses which need correction; I am simply trying to show that the history of this Bureau under the War Department affords no hope of improvement by the transfer contemplated by this bill, but the contrary.

In 1820 Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, in a communication o Henry Clay, Speaker of the House, says:

> Although partial advances may be made under the present system to civilize the Indians, I am of the opinion that until there is a radical change in the system any efforts which may be made must fall short of complete success.

That was the declaration of the Secretary of War, Mr. Calhoun, made to the House of Representatives, and Senators will find it in the State Papers, first session Sixteenth Congress, volume 3, No. 46, page 4, which I have here. The discussion of that question showed clearly at that time that the War Department had never advanced one step; but the Indians, if I may use such an expression, were on the "downward grade" at that time.

Here, then, is an acknowledgment from the head of that Department that in thirty years no progress had been made and no adequate system adopted.

In an elaborate and very able report made by the House Committee on Indian Affairs, May 30, 1834, (Reports of Committees, first session Twenty-third Congress, volume 4, No. 474, page 1,) it is stated that "So manifestly defective and inadequate is our present system that an immediate revision seems to be imperiously demanded." And Congress appears to have thought so too, for at that session, in pursuance of the recommendation of the committee, the act of 1834 was passed, under which the Indian Bureau was transferred from the War Department in 1849, when the Home, or Interior Department as it is now called, was established upon the recommendation of Robert J. Walker, then Secretary of the Treasury.

In regard to the Indian Department, as it was then called, the committee say further:

> The present organization of this Department is of doubtful origin and authority. Its administration is expensive, inefficient, and irresponsible.

That is the language of a committee of the House of Representatives in 1834 in reference to the management of Indian affairs under the War Department. They say it is "expensive, inefficient, and irresponsible." Fourteen years more, and growing worse instead of better, no effective system or practical laws suggested by the Department in charge. Had there been a Home Department in existence then, does any one suppose this Bureau would have remained long where it was? It was not removed, because there was no place for it to go to.

In 1841 a Committee on Retrenchment was ordered by the House; they submitted their report May 23, 1842, in which we find the following statement in reference to the Indian Bureau:

> The evidence is submitted as to the general management and present condition of Indian affairs, and it requires but little comment. It exhibits an almost total want of method and punctuality, equally unjust and injurious to the Government and to the tribes to whom we have voluntarily assumed obligations which we are not at liberty to disregard. It will be seen that the accounts of millions of expenditures have been so loosely kept as scarcely to furnish a trace or explanation of large sums, and that others have been misapplied so as to impose serious losses on the Indians and heavy responsibilities on the Government; that in some books (the only record of these accounts) no entries have been made for a period of several years; and that where entries have been made they are so imperfect that the very clerks who kept them could not state an account from them. The whole system of accounts in this Department requires revision and radical form. There has been great prodigality as to funds which should have been invested for the Indians, and the investments actually made have been in stocks of States, purchased in some instances above par, and now paid out by the Government as trustee at par, while they are worth only 25 or 30 cents on the dollar. The accounts in the Indian Bureau and in the Second Auditor's Office are very imperfect and are so kept as to facilitate the practice of irregularities with impunity. (Reports of Committees, second session Twenty-seventh Congress, 1841-'42, volume 4, No. 471, page 26.)

And yet, Mr. President, we are urged now to turn this Bureau over to the War Department, in order that correct accounts may be kept and irregularities checked. We have now been following its history under this Department for fifty years, and still matters grow no better, but worse, if anything.

Now, when Senators are told "the War Department for economy," here is a report made as late as 1842 that tells you the accounts were so imperfectly kept, so loosely kept, that no reliable statement could be made from them; that the Government was liable to great losses; that the money of the Indians was invested in stocks of States at great loss. This was the management; and now we are asked to turn it over again to a Department from which it was taken because of their neglect, because of the loose manner of doing business, because of their manner of treating the Indians. We are asked as a civilized nation to take it back there. Mr. President, I ask have the Senate and House of Representatives of this country forgotten the history of Indian affairs in this country? Have they failed to examine the history of Indian affairs while it was under the War Department? Is it because they have forgotten it that they wish it to go back there again where ten times the amount of irresponsibility exists, according to every report and every history that is found to-day?

I have now been following the history of this Indian Bureau under the War Department for fifty years, and still matters grow no better, but worse all the time. I call the attention of the Senate to this fact: Commence in 1789, when the Indians were placed under the War Department at its organization, follow the system for fifty years, and its history shows that it grew worse every day, instead of better. I defy contradiction.

Where, sir, in all these facts do we find any evidence of that rigid system and stern integrity for which this Department has been so much lauded in contrast with other Departments? As has already been said by some in this city, I will not say where, who advocated this side of the question, they want to turn it over to military men because they are honest. I am not here to assail the honesty of any man; but "I am sick and tired, and so is the country, of this eternal boast of the proverbial integrity and honesty of Army officers over other citizens." They are men of like passions as ourselves; and, while we cheerfully concede that they are our peers in honesty, integrity, and ability in their respective calling, we are unwilling to admit that they as a class are better than other men or that they are endowed by nature with or have acquired by education more versatile talents than other people have.

Reference has been made to extortions and wrongs perpetrated upon the Indians under the present system. That there are errors which need correction I will not deny; but let us refer to some of the prices paid by the Indians for articles under the old régime.

I call the attention of the Senate to a report which I have here, and I have copied it from the papers accompanying the report of 1834, made to the Congress of the United States already referred to. I find that at Fort Leavenworth, within easy reach of the markets, guns which cost in Saint Louis $7 were sold to the Indians for $30 apiece; axes costing thirty-seven and a half cents were turned over to them for $2 apiece. A double handful of salt—for that was the way they measured it then to the Indian—costing sixty-two cents a bushel, was turned over to the Indians for $1. Five and six gallon kettles, costing twenty-five cents per pound, sold for $12 apiece by the War Department to the Indians. On the navigable waters of the Upper Missouri a yard of strouding, costing $1.80, sold for $8; a blanket costing $3 sold for $10; calico costing sixteen cents per yard sold for $1; powder costing thirty cents per pound sold for $1.50; tobacco costing from five to seven cents sold for $1; blue strouding costing eighty cents sold for $9, &c.

If any gentleman disputes this, I have right here the sworn evidence, the bills reported to a committee of Congress in 1834, showing these facts in the face of all the honesty that is attributed to the War Department. I defy any man to show me that such robbery has ever been perpetrated on Indians in this country as was perpetrated, according to this report of 1834, by the War Department on the Indians of this country. It was robbery, sir; it was not fraud; it was open, palpable robbery.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator permit me one question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to know whether the Senator means to state that the Indian Department of the War Department paid for the goods at one price and that they were turned over by the Department to the Indians at another price?

Mr. LOGAN. I do. That is just what I say, that they were sold to the Indians at these prices while under the War Department.

Mr. BOGY. I cannot understand it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will explain.

Mr. BOGY. What is that report? Who made the report?

Mr. LOGAN. I will give the Senator the report, so that he will have no trouble about it. If it was not for taking up the time of the Senate I would read the whole thing. It is in the reports of committees for the second session of the Congress or 1841–'42, volume 1, No. 471, page 26, a report made by a committee who were investigating this question. The Indian Bureau then was in the War Department, and the evidence before that committee shows that these prices were paid by the lists of purchasers under the War Department, and sold to the Indians at the prices I have given. That is the report.

I do not want to take up the time of the Senate by reading from books; but, as I said in the outset, every statement I make is backed by official documents, and I will give you the page, &c., so that there shall be no trouble in finding it, and I will give you the book when I am through. I think I have searched this question up from its beginning. I have been at it a good while, and I do not propose to misstate anything.

Mr. BOGY. I have no doubt of the correctness of the Senator's statement so far as he is concerned; he should not misunderstand me; but there must be some misunderstanding somewhere, because it could not have been that the War Department obtained the goods at one price and turned them over to the Indians at another price, because the War Department at no time was authorized to trade and make a profit for the benefit of the War Department. There may have been some fraud. These may have been the prices of the Indian traders.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the Senator understand me. I do not say that the War Department turned them over for profit to the War Department. I am not saying that; but the War Department had control of the Indians; they belonged to the War Department; and if the officers of the Army had those goods bought at one price, and let them go to sutlers and traders, and allowed them to sell them at such an enormous advance, it was a fraud on the Indians, I do not care whether it was done by the Secretary of War, or by an officer, or anybody else.

Mr. BOGY. Those were the prices charged the Indians by the Indian traders.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. BOGY. Of course, I do not justify any such imposition, but there is a wide room and margin for explanation. I only wished it understood that these were the prices, not charged by the War Department, but charged by the Indian traders who were engaged in that business.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that as well as the Senator. I do not care whether it was done by the Indian trader, or the Secretary of War, or whom. The War Department had the full and complete control of the whole thing. No matter whether they did it themselves or permitted it to be done by others, the responsibility is the same. I am speaking of the difference between the swindling of Indians then and the swindling of Indians now; and the man who says that Indians are defrauded to-day as they were under the War Department does not know anything about the history of the Indians of this country or their treatment.

I would ask, Mr. President, if anything under the present system has ever equaled such outrageous extortion as that to which I have called attention? It is true this was under the old trader system; but why had this not long before been corrected; why had not the War Department brought about a correction of these errors when the responsibility rested with it for the policy pursued?

But, sir, it may be claimed that the Department was not responsible for the system or agents appointed. If not, then for Heaven's sake and for the honor of our country let us place it where somebody will be responsible. If a Department in fifty years' time can bring forward no plan to correct such abuses and cure such defects, but waits and waits until outside pressure forces these things home upon Congress, it is certainly time to remodel the Department or remove the business to some other.

It may be said that improvements were introduced between that time and 1849. That is in a measure true, sir, but these improvements originated not so much from the recommendations of that Department as from external influences pressing home upon Congress these crying evils and this defective management. It may also be said that this argument, if worth anything, applies also to the present management. That there are evils which need correction, I admit. In fact the House Committee on Appropriations in their report of February 25, 1871, say:

> The testimony shows irregularity, neglect, and incompetency, and in some instances a departure from the express provisions of law for the regulation of Indian expenditures and in the management of affairs in the Indian Department, but have not found evidence of fraud or corruption on the part of the Indian Commissioner.

This is true, sir, but what good would it do to another Department where it was even worse? But let us read a little further in the committee's report:

> With much to criticise and condemn, arising partly from a vicious system inherited from the past and partly from errors of judgment in the construction of statutes passed.

So that it appears even the errors now pertaining to this Bureau are in part chargeable to a vicious system which originated while it was under the War Department.

I call attention to another thing. At this very session of Congress the House of Representatives organized a committee for the purpose of examining the Indian Bureau to find frauds and peculations and everything of the kind, and yet I ask Senators to point out in the report of that committee these frauds that are talked about before the country as having been proven. They find no such thing. You find irregularities as you will in any matter connected with Indian tribes or people far off, in transportation or something of that kind; but when you talk about wholesale frauds in the Indian Department as compared with the outrages when it was under the War Department, there is no comparison.

Another matter of experience bearing upon this point is the influence exerted by soldiers when placed in the vicinity of Indians in reference to morality, good order, and progress in civilization. Senators are doubtless aware that in 1875 a circular was issued by the board of Indian commissioners to the various agencies making inquiry on this point as well as others. The answers with few exceptions show that this influence is pernicious, and that wherever soldiers are brought in contact with the Indians the debauchery of the women and the demoralization of the men inevitably follow. But, sir, lest it be said that the judgment of these agents was warped by interest, let us look back to the time when this Bureau was under the War Department and see what was the testimony on this point then. In the report of the committee made in 1834, page 22, to which I have already alluded, they say that from the facts brought to their notice they "cannot forbear the expression of a decided opinion of the impolicy of locating permanent military posts in the vicinity of Indian settlements."

The accompanying report of the three Indian commissioners is still stronger. They say, page 93 of the same report:

> It has been found by sad experience that a large military force stationed as this is—

Speaking of a certain force there—> surrounded by Indian settlements, has a demoralizing and unhappy influence upon the Indians, and serves to counteract in a very great degree the benevolent efforts of the Government to improve their condition. It has been found impossible to restrain the intercourse between the soldiers and the Indians; and what must be the consequence of such intercourse of near one thousand men such as soldiers generally are can be easily imagined.

It cannot be said that these commissioners were influenced by any such motives as are attributed to those answering in 1875, yet they speak out in unreserved terms as to the demoralizing influence exerted by soldiers when placed in the vicinity of Indians. And the fact is, Mr. President, we all know this is true without appealing to this testimony. It is and must be the universal verdict of experience. It is unnecessary for me to take up the time of the Senate in giving the facts and reasons for this, for every Senator is familiar with them.

But, sir, there is a reason taught by experience why this transfer should not be made which, as I have said, overtops all others in importance, and that is that it means war—war, interminable war, or war until the Indians are extinct. The word comes to us again and again that the military forces have struck a blow here that will quiet a tribe for all time to come; that a lesson has been taught another which will not be forgotten, yet scarcely a year passes by until another blow and another lesson are deemed necessary. Look, sir, to the history of this Bureau under the War Department and tell me what you see there. Each alternate page is crimson with blood, while we search the record almost in vain for any signs of progress in civilization. Our libraries teem with histories of these wars, while a few short pages tell us all that was done to redeem these tribes from savage life; wars, sir, which to-day cause every American philanthropist to hang his head in shame for his country, as he well knows that by judicious management, patient and humane treatment, they might have been prevented.

Take, for example, the history of the Seminole or Florida war as written by Captain John T. Sprague. I will not take time to read it, but will give the facts as they will be found, and I will give you the pages, so that any Senator can examine my authorities and see whether I am correct or not. He was brevetted for services rendered during that conflict; he does not hesitate to admit it was brought on unnecessarily, and then proceeds to give us a volume of more than half a thousand pages of the bloody record. There is the history of the Seminole war, (exhibiting a book.) Not more than a thousand Indians existed as Seminoles, and it required half a thousand of pages in order to recount the scenes of bloodshed and murder that took place during that time. That war against a foe scarce a thousand strong cost the nation $19,480,000, exclusive of the expenditures pertaining to the regular Army, which added make a total of $50,000,000. It lasted for seven years. Sir, the policy adopted then, and which is ever that of military control, is coolly given at the very commencement of this work of Sprague's. He says—

The liberty allowed them (the Indians) was to be circumscribed—

I desire you to listen to this. It shows what brought about the war—

The liberty allowed them (the Indians) was to be circumscribed, and they brought to know and to feel, too, that they were temporary occupants of the soil; and while indulgently allowed to remain in any part of the territory, law, good order, and sobriety, and subserviency to the whites must prevail.

This, then, was carried out by the soldiery until their outrages upon them produced war. We know what the result was of their bloody war. Take the language of Drake, the historian, (book 4, page 121, chapter 18:)

Nobody could have been surprised that a war in Florida should break out if they were at all acquainted with the circumstances which caused it; nor could they have been much surprised that a hundred men in the midst of the Indian country should have been beset and slain, leaving none to carry the tidings of such disaster. Our only surprise is that the work had not been done in a more savage manner, and that only a monument of ashes of the slain had not marked the place where they fell. These things astonish us, not the war itself.

Fifty million dollars spent, fourteen hundred and fifty-six lives from the Army alone, exclusive of the marines and citizens, sacrificed in a war for which there was no justification whatever. But what was the glory gained? Ah, sir, there is the point. There was glory in that war; and what was it? On page 551 of this volume you find this:

List of officers of the United States Army and Marine Corps upon whom have been conferred brevets for services in Florida, fifty-five.

That was the glory. A war lasting seven years, costing $50,000,000, against a thousand poor Indians down in Florida, brought about by circumscribing their rights and teaching them that they were only temporary occupants of the soil until they undertook to defend themselves, and our glory was that fifty-five officers received brevets! Rather expensive brevets, I must confess, but they got them. This is one chapter in the history of the War Department in their control of Indian affairs. Would to God it was the only one of the kind!

There is another that relates to the Sacs and Foxes, another relating to the Creeks and Cherokees. And even since the Bureau has been under the Interior Department it is stated positively by the Commissioner in 1868, and so far as I have seen not refuted, "That almost all the Indian wars which have depleted the Treasury and desolated our frontiers ever since the Bureau was given to the Interior Department had their origin in the precipitated and ill-considered action of the military stationed in the Indian country." Read, sir, the record given, officially charging the Sioux war of 1852-'54, the Cheyenne wars of 1864 and 1867, the Sioux war of 1866, and others of scarcely less importance, to the imprudence and impatience of the military forces on the frontiers. And even now the war-cry is sounding around the Black Hills to protect our citizens in violating the provisions of a treaty that we have solemnly made with the Indians.

There is the war-whoop you hear to-day. On what justification? The Army marches to the Black Hills, marching there with bayonet and sword to destroy the Indian. For what purpose? For the purpose of making him behave himself? No, sir; but to protect violators of the law violating the very treaty that you in this Senate solemnly agreed to between the United States and the Sioux in reference to their peaceable possession of the Black Hills country. But we must have war. Officers will not be needed unless we have war. Doubtless ere long we shall receive news perhaps of some brilliant campaign and a splendid victory which will equal perhaps the victories we have had in times gone by. Where does the blame lie? In the Army or in the Government?

There are some very curious things revealed by the records of military operations among the Indians. Take for example one or two of the tabulated statements copied into the report of the condition of the Indian tribes, made in 1867 by the joint special committee. The one on page 267 gives the lists and dates of stock taken by and from the Indians; and the number of officers, soldiers, citizens, and Indians killed and wounded during the year 1864 within the department of New Mexico. This table shows that on January 3 twenty mules were taken and one citizen killed and three wounded. On the 5th eleven cattle were taken. On the 6th of the same month fifty horses were taken from the Indians and forty Indians killed and thirty-five wounded; on the 11th another Indian killed; on the 12th sixty-two sheep, twenty-five horses, and one mule taken from the Indians and three Indians killed. Such is the record in full of ten days of great exploits—a number of Indians killed, very few white men, a number of horses, a number of cattle, a number of sheep, all taken from the Indians. Referring to the summing up for the year we find 4,250 sheep, 26 horses, 154 mules, and 32 cattle taken by the Indians; taken from them, 12,284 sheep, 2,472 horses, 35 mules, 31 cattle, and 18 burros—a clear gain on the part of the Government, if it received the benefit of the overplus, of 8,034 sheep, 2,446 horses, and 18 burros against a loss of 119 mules and 1 cow.

That is the statement made by the report of that Indian raid. The Indians made a terrible raid on the soldiery that year, and there were about three hundred Indians killed, and only three white people, and I believe two of them were citizens. In the great war of that year, in which we lost three persons, we captured 12,000 head of cattle more than they did. What became of them I do not know. This shows that it was a profitable business to have the Indians all the time attacking the white people. The death record shows one officer, six men, and eighteen citizens on the one side killed, and three hundred and sixty-three Indians killed on the other. Beyond all doubt, Mr. President, this exhibits alacrity and pluck on the part of the Army, but what shall we say in reference to it as a civilizing operation?

The matter of expense has been urged as one important reason why this Bureau should be transferred to the War Department. Although, as I have attempted to show, even if the arguments were sustained by the facts, this would not justify us in making the change; yet, sir, I do not believe the facts which really bear upon this point will justify us in believing the affairs will be administered more economically under that Department than under the Interior Department.

It is evident to every one who will examine the subject even superficially that a comparison of the expenses incurred in the administration of these affairs under the former with those under the latter afford no correct data by which to judge of this matter. The difference in the number of Indians under the care of the Government, the impossibility of arriving at the amount of war or Army expenses on this account, must necessarily vitiate all such general statistics to such an extent as to make them valueless in our attempt to arrive at a correct conclusion on this point. But even these, unreliable as they are, do not favor the proposed change.

Even limiting the expenses to those directly chargeable to the Bureau of Indian Affairs and comparing them with the number of Indians under the care of this Bureau at the corresponding dates, the result is still in favor of the Interior Department. But, sir, this gives us no clew to the expenses incurred in the unnecessary wars in which we have been involved by the imprudence and unadvised action of the military forces stationed among the Indians, or by the war policy which has so repeatedly been brought into play, both before and after the change in 1849, through military influence. We may add further, as an item showing the unreliability of such statistics, that until recently all estimates of the numbers of Indians in the various tribes were as a rule purely guess-work, and not the result of actual count.

Our estimates of the comparative expenses under the two Departments must therefore be made, not upon the figures derived from past history, but upon what is now known; not upon the unworthy statistics of the past, but upon the prices and costs of the present.

It is not supposed that Army officers and soldiers will cease their military functions and duties to become agents and employés, for this is presuming that there is now a surplus of these which might be better employed than at present, which is most emphatically denied by the military authorities whenever an attempt at reduction is made. It follows, then, that no reduction in the number of agents and employés could be made under the War Department which cannot as well be made under the Interior Department, if necessary. There is, sir, no escape from this conclusion. In this respect it is therefore clear no reduction in expense could be made after the change which cannot as well be made without it. In the next place, the cost paid for articles purchased by the Indian Department—I call the attention of my friend from Missouri to this table to show the difference in the cost price of purchases by the Army and by the Indian Bureau, inasmuch as he was a little surprised at my statement a short time ago. This table is taken from an official report:

The excess is almost double all the way through in the cost of beef, in the cost of flour, in the cost of corn. Then if you go to transportation I have the contracts here that I can show in the matter of transportation where the difference is about the same. Where the Indian Bureau pays $2 a hundred for transporting their goods the Army pays $3.75, and that is the way it runs all through. When I speak of this I only do so to show that this talk of economy by placing the Bureau under the War Department is utterly without foundation in fact.

I have been speaking in reference to the difference in price for certain articles, and exhibiting a table showing the amount paid by the War Department and by the Indian Bureau. If that table is correct, how can this change bring about the reduction in expenses that it is claimed it will do? Sir, it is all a fallacy, and is made, I must believe, without thoroughly considering the matter or question of expense. While it is claimed that the Army officers are proverbially honest, it has always been admitted that all operations under military men are proverbially expensive. Add to this the expense of an exterminating war, which is almost sure to be the result if this change is made, and then you will be able to form a proper idea of what will be the effect of changing this Bureau. Why, sir, the military authorities will most assuredly understand that it indicates an abandonment of the peace policy, and that it means war; yes, sir, war to the hilt. And ere long report after report from Department officers will be pouring in asking more forces for this point and more troops for that, thereby making an increase of the Army necessary. It requires no prophet to foresee this, as it is a natural consequence attested by the history of the past. Do Senators desire such a result as this? If they do, all they have to do is to follow the House in transferring this Bureau to the War Department.

But why was this Bureau transferred from the War Department to the Interior Department? I ask Senators whom I find perhaps determined to vote for this transfer merely for a change on the idea that they may make the country believe that it is for economy, when they come to argue this question, to tell me why this Bureau was transferred from the War Department. It was there for fifty years. Why was it done? Was it done to benefit the Indians? Was it done to benefit the Army? Why was it done? It was done to benefit the Indians first, the officers and soldiers second, then to secure the Government against outrages. It was the result of long experience and thorough deliberation on the part of great statesmen, equally as great, I think, as we find at this day.

The act of August 7, 1789, establishing the War Department, places Indian affairs under that Department. As early as 1816 Mr. Crawford, then Secretary of War, suggests that Indian affairs ought to be removed from that Department, and states briefly his reasons therefor. (American State Papers, Indian Affairs, volume 2, page 27.) If I am not mistaken, though I have not the reference at hand, Mr. Monroe, in 1825, urges the same thing. And Mr. Webster, in a speech in 1849, says that Washington and Jefferson suggested a home department, which indicates at least that they held the same view as to where this Bureau ought to go. This view was repeatedly expressed during this part of our history, which I shall not take time to refer to, but I will delay for a moment to call attention to the last communication made by Mr. Robert J. Walker before retiring from his position as Secretary of the Treasury, not only to show his opinion on the point now before us, but also to contrast his broad and statesman-like views on the Indian questions with those held by some of his pretended followers at the present day.

In his communication he remarks:

The duties now performed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are most numerous and important, and must be vastly increased with the great number of tribes scattered over Texas, Oregon, New Mexico, and California, and with the interesting progress of so many of the tribes in Christianity, knowledge, and civilization. These duties do not necessarily appertain to war, but to peace and to our domestic relations with those tribes placed by the Constitution under the charge of the Government. This most important Bureau, then, should be detached from the War Department, with which it has no necessary connection. (Executive Document, second session Thirtieth Congress, volume 2, 1848–'49, No. 2, page 36.)

The mind of Robert J. Walker, in 1849, a statesman and a Secretary of the Treasury, who is regarded as a model, was drawn to see what some people cannot now see, for I have heard it asked how it is that the expenses are greater now than they were fifteen years ago. If the Senator who asked that question will read the report of Robert J. Walker he will find in that report the reason. What is it? He says our relations across the Mississippi with the Indians of Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, and all this vast country that we had acquired the year before would, of course, increase our expenses. These Indians were brought in as this country was brought in by us, and he speaks of it, and says that this Bureau has no connection necessarily with the War Department, but with the peace Department, and therefore he recommends its immediate change. I will venture the assertion that you cannot find a report made by any statesman, by any man of eminence in this country, outside of a military officer, that ever advocated the Bureau belonging to the War Department. If it can be found, I should like to see it, for I have searched in every history, in every report that I could find. I may have missed some. If I have, I hope somebody else will find it; but I fail to find that any statesman or man having charge of this Government as President or Secretary has ever recommended that this Bureau should belong to the War Department; but they have universally said it ought to be divorced or separated from the War Department, for the reason that it ought to be in the peace Department, if we intended civilization.

Mr. President, Mr. Walker did not expect the scope of Indian affairs to remain within its then even extended limits; he looked forward not only to an expansion in work, but also in expense, and in the great work of civilizing and Christianizing these unfortunate tribes. And I would to God that to-day Congress could be induced to look upon it as a great work, a work on which with proper organization and system, and with hearty interest, not only seven but ten millions might be judiciously expended annually and yet not increase our total expenditures by a single penny, but eventually stop war and bloodshed and redeem these wandering tribes from their savage state.

This recommendation of Mr. Walker, after able discussion in Congress, resulted in the formation of the Interior Department and the transfer of the Bureau of Indian Affairs thereto. It cannot, therefore, be said that this transfer was accidental or hastily done without due deliberation; it was the result of long experience and much thought on the part of the ablest statesmen whose names adorn our political history.

Has subsequent experience served to change this view, so universal before the transfer? Far from it, sir; although affairs have not been administered with the prudence and fidelity which the people had a right to demand and expect; although much remains to be corrected, and the system is yet far from being perfect, the great mass of testimony speaks loudly against such transfer as is contemplated by the House of Representatives.

In 1866 a joint committee was appointed by Congress to inquire into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities. This committee made their report January 26, 1867, through Senator Doolittle to the Senate of the United States. An examination of this report, which is voluminous, shows the committee did their work thoroughly and faithfully, and that this question of transfer was thoroughly considered. The conclusion they arrived at is in these words, Mr. Doolittle speaking for the committee as chairman:

Weighing the matter and all the arguments for and against the proposed change, your committee are of the unanimous opinion that the Indian Bureau should remain where it is.

Coming close upon the heels of a long and tedious internal war, this opinion is significant.

That has been the report of every committee that has ever been formed for that purpose until two, one of this last House and one other. In 1867, but six months after the report alluded to, Congress created a board of commissioners for the purpose of establishing peace with certain hostile Indians. This commission, composed of the Indian Commissioner, one Senator, two civilians, and four generals of the Army, made report to the President January 8, 1868, in which they express themselves in reference to this point as follows:

> This brings us to consider the much-mooted question whether the Bureau should belong to the civil or military Department of the Government. To determine this properly we must first know what is to be the future treatment of the Indians. If we intend to have war with them the Bureau should go to the Secretary of War. If we intend to have peace it should be in the civil Department. In our judgment such wars are wholly unnecessary, and hoping that the Government and people will agree with us we cannot now advise the change.

They then proceed to give briefly their reasons for this opinion, which coincide, so far as they go, with those I have advanced.

Strange as it may seem, this same committee in October, 1868, after presenting their report, met in Chicago, Senator Henderson being absent, thus leaving the military element in the majority, and there they gave it as their opinion that this Bureau should at once be transferred to the War Department.

That proves what I said, that you cannot find a report of statesmen in this country that has not been against it, except where military men have had control; but the first report was a unanimous report.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to say that the military officers resolved so at Chicago?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator has the report, I should be glad to have him read it.

Mr. LOGAN. I have part of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there was a disagreement there among the military officers.

Mr. LOGAN. That makes no difference; their report never was made, and I only speak of what they resolved. The first report against the transfer was made to the President, and afterward in a meeting these men did vote in favor of a transfer to the War Department. That is so given in the history of the affair in the report of the commissioners.

If we suppose they understood and intended what they said in their first report, how are we to understand the second? Unless we look upon them as children, forgetting to-day what they said yesterday, we must believe, not that their views changed as to general principles, but as to purpose and policy, and the predominance of the military element unfolds the secret. They believed at the first meeting that the transfer meant war and useless war, but the convenient "now" inserted in the first report has passed, and the opportunity to express the military sentiment has come. And what is it Mr. President? War! war! war! We need no stronger evidence of the opinion so often expressed that the transfer means war; exterminating war.

Before closing let us examine a moment the results under the present arrangement, and see whether there are not some good fruits, notwithstanding the errors and defects with which it is chargeable.

Look at the summary of the statistics presented by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1874, and found on page 112 of his report:

Number of Indians in the United States, exclusive of those in Alaska		275,003
Number of Indians who are mixed bloods		5,703
Number of white persons on Indian reservations:
Employés		904
Additional members of families		855
Other white persons		750
Number of school buildings upon Indian reservations		232
Number of schools upon Indian reservations		345
Number of scholars: males, 5,797; females, 5,161		10,958
Number of teachers		407
Number of Indians who can read: adults, 1,392; youths, 2,616		4,008
Number of Indians who have learned to read during the year		961
Number of missionaries among the Indians		111
Amount contributed by religious societies:	For education	$11,234 15
	For other purposes	$45,530 04
Number of church buildings		128
Number of church members		21,596
Number of Indians who have learned trades during the year		81
Number of Indians who have received medical attendance		27,553
Number of births		2,152
Number of deaths		1,490
Number of Indians who wear citizens' dress		43,953
Number of Indians killed during the year:	By members of same tribe	102
	By hostile Indians	52
	By United States soldiers,	122
	By citizens	55
Number of white persons killed by Indians		85
Number of white persons committing crimes against Indians		149
Number of white persons punished for crimes against Indians		19

First we have the exact number of Indians, which is one very important step in the work before us; three hundred and forty-five schools upon reservations and nearly eleven thousand scholars, or 4 per cent. of the entire Indian population attending these schools. Is there no sign of progress in this? Number of church members, 21,596, or nearly 8 per cent. of all that are within our bounds. Is there not encouragement in this? No matter if their ideas of the obligations of this relation are crude, the simple fact that nearly one-twelfth of the entire Indian population has entered into this relation ought certainly make us hesitate long before placing a check upon it. Another encouraging indication is the increase of births over deaths. Although the statistics on this point appear to be defective, nevertheless they show clearly a tendency to increase under the present policy, which is one of the best possible marks of success.

A Senator awhile ago spoke of the decrease of the Indians. I call his attention to the statistics to see whether he is correct or not. There is an increase of births over deaths; and until this policy was adopted there was no such thing as an increase among the Indians. They were decreasing all the time from wars among themselves and wars with the whites; but since this policy has been adopted, within the last eight years, there is an increase of births over deaths and destruction of life among the Indians, which is an encouraging sign.

Now let us turn to the table on page 131 of the same report, giving a summary of the industrial operations. From this we ascertain that the Indians cultivated during the year 317,213 acres of land, producing nearly 2,000,000 bushels of corn, over 260,000 bushels of wheat, 346,000 bushels of potatoes, 171,000 bushels of oats, besides turnips, onions, and other vegetables and things that were necessary to their subsistence. Is there no sign of civilization in this, Mr. President? When we see such progress as this, and learn there are nearly 44,000, or 16 per cent. of the entire number, engaged in agricultural pursuits, it is worse than neglect or carelessness on our part to let this good work be checked; it is dishonor to our nation and a criminal disregard of our duty and the obligations we owe to these outcast races. Sir, when I look at these statistics, which seem to mark the dawn of a brighter day for these savage tribes, and in the light of past history contemplate the effect of the passage of this bill, I grow faint and sick at heart.

But how stands the work of civilization when the numbers are compared? Out of 275,000 there are 100,000 who, as the Commissioner informs us, may, without violence to the term, be called civilized; 52,000 who are in a semi-civilized state; while in the wilder tribes, among which the hostile members are to be found, there are less than 100,000. Thus we see that in fact about 36 per cent. of the entire number are already civilized and almost, if not quite, ready to be granted full rights of citizenship; 18 per cent. are being brought under the influence of civilization and are laying aside their wild and savage habits; while there are but 36 per cent. yet in their wild and savage state.

Will we dare say in the face of all these facts, unsatisfactory as many experiments have been when we look at the isolated efforts, that the Indians cannot be civilized? Sir, it is too late in the day to express such an opinion as that, when the civilizing forces have already broken off from the mass more than half its bulk.

I tell Senators now there is no political reputation in this; there is no political clap-trap in proving to the country that you have no faith in civil authority. There is nothing to be gained by trying to convince the country that this must become a military despotism. The man who attempts to make himself a popular statesman by advocating military authority to rule over civil authority fails to utter the voice of the American people. Sir, I have been a soldier many years of my life, and I love the position of a soldier. I was fond of it when I belonged to the Army, but my belonging to the Army never changed my education so far as governmental affairs were concerned. I have learned from history, by my reading from my childhood, that the downfall of governments was by putting power in military hands. I have learned that republics must and can only be maintained by civil authority, not by military.

Put the Indian Department under the War Department, then the Pension Bureau next, then the Land Office next, then abolish the Interior Department next, and then you have got one-fourth of the Government under the charge of the military, and thus a long step taken toward the resumption of military authority in this country. Remember the voice of Clay and Webster, of the great statesmen in this land against the usurpations and inroads of military authority. It is a lesson that might well be learned now by men who are pluming themselves that they are becoming great statesmen. Sir, it is a lesson to be learned by the rising and future generations, for the time will never come that you will satisfy the honest people of this country by making them believe that they are not fit for civil Government. I warn now the party that undertakes this step in politics as well as in civilization and the advance of Christianity in this country; I warn the man of his future who does it, for there is not an honest Christian in this land, be he of whatever politics he may, who does not abhor the idea of military government. He believes in peaceful means in bringing about civilization, and is willing to undertake it, and do not deprive him of the opportunity.

Mr. President, I have not examined in order to see, but am inclined to believe there is one space in our Centennial display which remains unoccupied: that is an exhibit of the effect of our Indian policy during the past hundred years. There may be and doubtless are exhibits of Indian relics, implements, ornaments, trappings, &c., and there may be examples of their workmanship and evidences of their recent progress in the arts of industry; but, sir, I scarcely think we will find there a list of the tribes which once flourished on the soil we now occupy, but which have become extinct in consequence of our contact with them. I presume that we will not find exhibited there the crimson pages of our history, stained by the blood of unnecessary Indian wars. I presume, sir, we will find there no display of the treaties so solemnly made, which have been ruthlessly broken in our anxiety to obtain their lands and appropriate their possessions.

There may be antiquities to remind us of the days of William Penn, but we will scarcely find any tokens to call before us the war of the Everglades and the history of the Seminoles. Sir, I fear, nay, I should rather say I rejoice, to think this space is left vacant or filled with other things than that which belongs there properly.

Had I the time and a list prepared I would present in array one after another the numerous tribes that once flourished over our broad area but have silently passed into oblivion before the irresistible progress of civilization, with scarcely an effort on our part to save them from extinction. I would point you to a few miserable remnants of tribes, who once sent terror through our borders when provoked by unnecessary war and unwise action on our part. That some have met deserved fate there is no doubt; that horrid cruelties have their history cannot be denied; but, sir, it was our mission to redeem them from savage life and elevate them in the scale of being for which they were formed. And as we now stand upon the one hundredth annual round of our national existence and look down the vista of receding years can we contemplate the picture without a single pang of remorse; can we say we have been faithful to the trust reposed in us?

Sir, the record is made, the history is written, and, although much of it is crimsoned with unnecessary blood, it must stand; it is beyond our power now to change it; but the present and the future are not beyond recall. Let us then in this matter vindicate our right to the name "Christian nation," and let no false ideas of economy, in order to gain political capital, prevent us from doing our duty, and whole duty, as a nation to these unfortunate and degraded people.

One single item in the Commissioner's last report, small as it is, is sufficient in itself to justify our outlay on this Bureau; that is, that the births exceed the deaths. It indicates that the tendency to extinction has ceased, and that by wise measures and the civilizing process the forces of decay may be checked.

Why, sir, when I turn away from the sad picture of the past and look forward to what the future of this people may be if the policy now adopted is properly sustained and the system for accomplishing the work thoroughly and wisely revised and placed on a proper footing, I feel a deep anxiety to have my name recorded as one of the advocates and defenders of this policy. As I look forward and trace the history of the future, as the veil lifts year by year, and see one after another of the tribes gathered on suitable reservations and gradually, though slowly, learning the arts of husbandry, and the children gathered in the school-rooms and gradually acquiring an education; as I see the females, now beasts of burden, step by step acquiring their proper position in social life, it binds my heart to my country by a new tie. As I lengthen my gaze and look a little farther, I see waving fields of grain and happy homes where once roved the wild buffalo and wilder savages; the children of these once savage hordes have grown into manhood and womanhood; they have taken on them the habiliments of civilization; and now no longer is the wild war-whoop heard from ocean to ocean, no longer is there need for a military post, scout, or soldier on our borders of civilization, for we have none save the ocean bounds east and west and national bounds north and south. I catch one more glance before the vision fades, and I see these tribes, redeemed and Christianized, admitted to all the rights of civilization and citizenship, and side by side in these halls sit their representatives, and I listen in admiration while that native eloquence, now educated and trained in all the arts of elocution and oratory, thrills with admiration the attentive audience. Sir, could I link my name with a measure which will result in this end, I will feel sure that it will live and endure while the rolls and records of time endure.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess from twenty-five minutes past five until half past seven o'clock. I fix the time at twenty-five minutes past five because the Senator from Florida [Mr. CONOVER] is very anxious for an executive session. I need not attempt to impress the Senate with the necessity for this night session. Every Senator must understand it as well as I do. There is but this one proposition in the bill that will occupy any time. The evening is cool and pleasant, and with a recess I am satisfied that we can close this bill to-night. If we do not take a recess we shall probably adjourn half an hour hence, and spend the entire day to-morrow. We have no day to spare.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONOVER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will state——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut has priority. His motion is that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EATON. I withdraw it for the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us settle the recess first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion to adjourn withdrawn?

Mr. EATON. Only for the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida withdraw his motion?

Mr. CONOVER. The Senator from Connecticut, I understand, withdraws his motion to allow me to have my motion considered.

Mr. WINDOM. I have allowed time enough for an executive session.

Mr. CONOVER. I will withdraw the motion for the purpose of settling the matter of the recess.

Mr. EATON. Then I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 23.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate take a recess from twenty-five minutes past five to half past seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 15.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONOVER. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs to strike out the third section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby abolished, and the salary heretofore paid to such officer shall cease, and the offices of superintendents of Indian affairs, clerks to the same, of agents and special agents, interpreters, inspectors, and all other employés of the Indian Bureau are hereby abolished; and the salary heretofore paid to such officers respectively shall cease, and the duties now intrusted to, and performed by, said officers, of every kind and description, shall be performed by officers, soldiers, and employés of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War; and they shall receive no additional pay by reason of the performance of the duties aforenamed thus transferred to them, other than the pay they may receive as officers and employés of the Army; and the Secretary of War shall assign them their duties in connection with the supervision, control, and management of Indian affairs, under such regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the execution of all laws and parts of laws applicable to the management and control of Indian affairs and of matters arising out of Indian relations is hereby transferred to, and placed under, the control of the Secretary of War, who is hereby empowered to, and shall, exercise the same authority in the control of all Indian affairs heretofore had by the Secretary of the Interior; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize an increase in the number, rank, pay or allowances of officers of the Army in excess of that now provided by law, and its provisions shall be applicable to officers on the retired list of the Army, who, when on such duty, shall receive full pay and allowance of the rank in the regular Army held by them at their retirement, as prescribed by law for officers on the active list.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment heretofore reserved, pending the fate of the amendment just acted upon, will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as lines 8 to 55 of section 1.

For pay of one superintendent of Indian affairs for the central superintendency, $2,000.

For pay of sixty-eight agents of Indian affairs, at $1,500 each, except the one at Iowa, at $500, namely:

Six for the tribes in Oregon, namely, Warm Springs, Klamath, Grande Ronde, Siletz, Umatilla, and Malheur agencies;

Five for the tribes in Washington Territory, namely, Neah Bay, Yakama, Colville, Nisqually, and Skokomish agencies;

Three for the tribes in California, namely, Hoopa Valley, Round Valley, and Tule River agencies;

Two for the tribes in Nevada, namely, Pi-Ute and Walker River and Pyramid Lake agencies;

Three for the tribes in Idaho, namely, Nez Percé, Lemhi, and Fort Hall agencies;

Four for the tribes in Montana, namely, Flathead, Blackfeet, Crow, and Fort Peck agencies;

Eleven for the tribes in Dakota, namely, Red Cloud, Spotted Tail, Yankton, Ponca, Crow Creek, Grand River, Cheyenne River, Fort Berthold, Sisseton, Devil's Lake, and Lower Brulé agencies;

One for the tribes in Wyoming, namely, Shoshone agency;

One for the tribes in Utah, namely, Uintah Valley agency;

Five for the tribes in New Mexico, namely, Pueblo, Abiquiu, Navajo, Mescalero, Apache, and Southern Apache agencies;

Three for the tribes in Colorado, namely, Los Pinos, White River, and Southern Ute agencies;

Six for the tribes in Nebraska, namely, Great Nemaha, Omaha, Winnebago, Pawnee, Ottoe, and Santee agencies;

One for the tribes in Kansas;

Seven for the tribes in the Indian Territory, namely, Sac and Fox, Quapaw, Osage, Kiowa and Comanche, Cheyenne and Arapaho, and Wichita agencies; and one for the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws and Chickasaws, and Seminoles:

One for the tribes in Minnesota, namely, at the White Earth agency;

One for the tribes in Iowa, namely, at the Sac and Fox of Iowa agency, $500: Provided, That no salary shall be paid to the agent unless he lives near enough to the agency to teach and care for the tribe every day; and no incidental expenses shall be allowed for this agency, and no employés except teachers;

For the support of a school at said agency, $1,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to strike out after the word "agency," in line 52, the words, "and no employés except teachers."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I move also to strike out lines 54 and 55, as they are provided for elsewhere; they are by mistake duplicated:

For the support of a school at said agency, $1,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next reserved amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as lines 55 to 143, the following words:

Two of the tribes in Wisconsin, namely, at the Green Bay and La Pointe agencies:

One for the tribes in Michigan, namely, at the Mackinac agency;

One for the New York Indians, namely, at the New York agency;

Four for the tribes in Arizona, namely, Colorado River, Pima and Maricopa, San Carlos, and Moquis Pueblo agencies; in all, $101,000.

For pay of six special agents, namely, one for the Chippewas at Red Lake; one for the Pillagers at Leach Lake, Minnesota; one for the Mission Indians in California; one for the Eastern Cherokees and other Indians in North Carolina; and two for the tribes in Washington Territory, namely, Tulalip and Quinaielt, at $1,500 each, $9,000.

For pay of one chief clerk, $1,600; one assistant clerk, $1,200; and one copyist, $600, for the Central superintendency, $3,400.

For pay of seventy-seven interpreters, as follows:

Seven for the tribes in Oregon, namely, two for the Klamath agency, and one each for the Grande Ronde, Siletz, Umatilla, Warm Spring, and Malheur, at $500 per annum each;

Six interpreters for the tribes in Washington Territory, to be assigned to such agencies as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, at $500 each per annum;

Two for the tribes in Idaho, namely, at Nez Percé and Fort Hall agencies, at $500 per annum each;

Three for the tribes in Nevada, namely, at Pi-Ute and Walker River and Pyramid Lake reservations, at $500 each;

Five for the tribes in Montana, namely, one each at Flathead, Blackfoot, and Crow, and two at Fort Peck agencies, at $400 each;

Twelve for the tribes in Dakota, namely, two at Fort Berthold, and one each at Red Cloud, Spotted Tail, Yankton, Ponca, Crow Creek, Grand River, Cheyenne River, Sisseton, Devil's Lake, and Lower Brulé agencies, at $400 per annum each;

One for the tribes in Wyoming, at the Shoshone agency, at $500;

One for the tribes in Utah, at $500 per annum;

Seven for the tribes in New Mexico, namely, two for the Navajo agency, and one each for the Cimarron, Mescalero Apache, Southern Apache, Pueblo, and Abiquiu agencies, at $500 each per annum;

Three for the tribes in Colorado, namely, Los Pinos, White River, and Southern Ute agencies, at $500 per annum each;

Seven for the tribes in Nebraska, to be assigned to such agencies as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, at $400 per annum each;

For the tribes in Kansas, $500, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to supply temporary interpreters;

Eight for the tribes in the Indian Territory, to be assigned as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, at $400 per annum each; and $600, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to supply temporary interpreters for the semi-civilized tribes;

Three for the tribes in Wisconsin, namely, one for the Green Bay and two for the La Pointe agency, at $400 each;

Four for the tribes in Minnesota, namely, Boise Forte, White Earth, Red Lake, and Leach Lake special agencies, at $400 each;

Two for the tribes in Michigan, namely, Mackinac agency, at $400 each;

Six for the tribes in Arizona, namely, two for San Carlos, and one each for Colorado River, Pima and Maricopa, Moquis Pueblo, and Papago agencies, at $400 each; making forty-seven interpreters, at $400 each; thirty interpreters, at $500 each; and $1,100 for temporary interpreters; in all, $34,900.

For pay of three Indian inspectors, at $3,000 each, $9,000.

For necessary traveling expenses of three Indian inspectors, $6,000.

For buildings at agencies, and repairs of the same, $15,000.

For contingencies of the Indian service, including traveling, incidental, current, and contingent expenses of superintendents and agents, and of their offices, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [4,] 3, to strike out in line 3 the words, "made to Congress of the operations of the Department having charge of the Indian service," and to insert the words, "of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs;" so as to read:

That in all lettings of contracts in connection with the Indian service the proposals or bids received shall be filed and preserved, and in the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs there shall be embodied a detailed or tabular statement of all bids, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [4,] 3, line 11, after the word "received," to strike out the following words:

And an abstract of all bids or proposals received for the supplies or services embraced in any contract shall be attached to, and filed with, the said contract when the same is filed in the office of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the distribution of all annuities, goods, and provisions shall, as far as practicable, be made at the various military posts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 7, as follows:

SEC. 7. The certificate of a judge of the district court of the United States, or of a judge of the supreme court of any Territory, given under the seal of the court, attached to the application of any citizen of the United States for license to trade with the Indians, which certificate shall set forth that such person is of good moral character and a fit person to be in the Indian country, shall be accepted by the agent to which it is directed, and by the head of the Department in charge of Indian affairs as conclusive evidence of the fitness of such person to receive a license to trade with the Indians, subject to the provisions of law and regulations issued in accordance therewith; and upon compliance herewith a license shall be granted to the applicant, which license shall be approved by the head of the Department having jurisdiction of the Indian affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This concludes the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations. The bill is open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendments be concurred in in gross?

Mr. DAVIS. I ask what has been done with that portion of the bill relating to the transfer of the Indian Bureau?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course that amendment will have to be reserved. It is generally known that I make no objection to anything that is done. When I entered the Chamber there were but few Senators here, and a vote was being taken. I had no idea that on any amendment on which there was a question a vote would be taken. I thought this amendment would be passed by, and therefore I said nothing. It is well known that there are two or three Senators on this side of the Chamber who wish to speak on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can reserve it.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that very well; but I hardly thought the Senator from Minnesota having charge of the bill would press the amendment to a vote in committee. I understand that as it now stands a vote cannot be taken upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote can be taken upon it in the Senate. The bill is now in the Senate, and the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. If the Senator from West Virginia wishes to reserve the amendment referred to, the vote will be taken separately upon it.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand just how it is. The bill is in the Senate; but there are two or three Senators who wish to speak upon the amendment to which I refer. I shall probably vote with the Senator from Minnesota upon the bill; but I think it unfair to those Senators that we should hurry it along in that way without giving them an opportunity to speak before the bill was reported to the Senate. I do not know what amendment they may desire to it. They may desire to make some amendment to the amendment. I hope it will be withheld for a few minutes at least, until one or two of those Senators come in. I saw one as I came along who had told me previous to the recess that he intended to speak upon the amendment. I think it would be better not to hurry, but to wait a few minutes.

Mr. WINDOM. I certainly have had no desire to hurry the bill. I will say to my friend from West Virginia that the amendments came up in their regular order. As I understood the recess, we were to meet at half past seven. It is now a quarter of an hour past the time. I had not taken the trouble to count the Senate. It looked a little sparse, I know, at the time we re-assembled, but I had my eye upon my friend from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who always makes a quorum, and I had no doubt that there was a quorum in the Chamber.

Mr. DAVIS. I will not ask the question whether or not a quorum is present. The Senator from Minnesota knows whether there is or not. It is hardly worth while to call the fact in question.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to take advantage of no one, certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course there is not a quorum here now.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator from West Virginia or any one else desires to be heard, the question is now open and he can address the Senate on the amendment, having first reserved it.

Mr. DAVIS. I probably will agree with the Senator from Minnesota upon the bill. I know his fairness and that he has no desire to get rid of any question. We know there was a speech, and a very able one, made this evening on one side of the question, and I think I probably said to the Senator that there would be one or two more Senators on this side who wished to address the Senate on the subject.

Mr. WINDOM. What does the Senator desire now?

Mr. DAVIS. I desire more to take time until those Senators come in than anything else, and probably that is the reason I am speaking now.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator has the floor and can move a call of the Senate. Perhaps the Senators to whom he refers will be in by that time.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to inquire whether the bill has been reported to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been reported to the Senate, and the question now is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KERNAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays. I desire to say that, like the Senator in charge of the bill, I relied on the Senator from Vermont to see whether there was a quorum. I did not get here quite soon enough.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator misunderstood my meaning. I did not rely on the Senator from Vermont in that sense.

Mr. KERNAN. I said I did; but I got in the Chamber ten minutes late.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am surprised to hear my friend from New York say he was a little late. I supposed he was here in obedience to the rules of the Senate. I kept my eye on the Chair, and I had no doubt I was supported by my friend from New York and all the democracy. They are always here.

Mr. KERNAN. I will say to my friend that I got here a little late; but I have been here for some minutes. I desire to have the yeas and nays to see whether there is a quorum to begin with.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we have a call we can find out who are here.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask for a division.

Mr. EATON. May I ask the Chair a question? As I understand, the pending amendment before the recess was to strike out the part of the bill relating to the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. What was done with that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was agreed to.

Mr. EATON. The section has been stricken out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is stricken out.

Mr. EATON. Stricken out with a dozen members present! I suppose it will be open to debate hereafter in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presumed there was a quorum present. The attempt was made to call for the yeas and nays, but there was not a sufficient number seconding the call.

Mr. EATON. It was the presumption of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presumption of the Chair was that there was a quorum present.

Mr. EATON. It was doubtless a proper, though rather a violent one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Hardly, in the presence of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. KELLY. I ask that a separate vote be taken on the amendment to strike out section 3.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the transfer amendment?

Mr. KELLY. It is the transfer amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon reserves the amendment he has named.

Mr. BOGY. I think there is a little misunderstanding about what has transpired. The object, I understood, was to get the bill out of Committee of the Whole and into the Senate in the least time, and any one having any objection to any portion of the bill can make it in the Senate as well as in committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; and any one can make it now.

Mr. BOGY. There is really no consequence in it. This amendment has now been reserved, and the same objection can be made in the Senate as could have been made in committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to reserve all those amendments which relate to the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department from the Interior, so as to include all that touch that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon has reserved the amendment striking out section 3 in relation to the transfer.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is one particular amendment, section 3, and then there are other amendments in the beginning of the bill which ought to be reserved in connection with it. I desire to reserve all those amendments which refer directly to that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments incident to the transfer amendment will be reserved.

Mr. DAVIS. It will be noticed that at the beginning of the bill there are a number of these amendments. If the transfer of the Indian Bureau should be made as the bill came from the House, of course these amendments would be useless.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri desires the amendments to be reserved down to page 7.

Mr. COOPER. I ask for a separate vote upon all the amendments adopted in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks a separate vote upon all the amendments. They will be taken in their order. The first amendment will be reported.

Mr. KERNAN. I suggest, if it meet the approbation of Senators, that we vote on the amendment relating to the transfer first, because many of the other amendments will depend on whether that is concurred in.

Mr. COOPER. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask that the amendments be passed over until we reach the amendment striking out the section which proposes a transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. That is the third section. If gentlemen desire to address the Senate upon it, they can do so, and this course will enable us to get a vote upon that amendment first.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from New York is right, because on that amendment depend all these other amendments.

Mr. KERNAN. We had better dispose of that first.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understood the Senator from Tennessee, he asked for a separate vote upon all the amendments agreed to in committee. The amendments which do not relate to the transfer of the Indian Bureau can be taken up and acted on now.

Mr. KERNAN. We had better dispose of them afterward, and settle this question first.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment striking out the third section as proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the third section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby abolished, and the salary heretofore paid to such officer shall cease, and the offices of superintendents of Indian affairs, clerks to the same, of agents and special agents, interpreters, inspectors, and all other employés of the Indian Bureau, are hereby abolished; and the salary heretofore paid to such officers respectively shall cease; and the duties now intrusted to and performed by said officers, of every kind and description, shall be performed by officers, soldiers, and employés of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War; and they shall receive no additional pay by reason of the performance of the duties aforenamed, thus transferred to them, other than the pay they may receive as officers and employés of the Army; and the Secretary of War shall assign them their duties in connection with the supervision, control, and management of Indian affairs under such regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the execution of all laws and parts of laws applicable to the management and control of Indian affairs and of matters arising out of Indian relations is hereby transferred to, and placed under, the control of the Secretary of War, who is hereby empowered to, and shall, exercise the same authority in the control of all Indian affairs heretofore had by the Secretary of the Interior; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize an increase in the number, rank, pay, or allowances of officers of the Army in excess of that now provided by law, and its provisions shall be applicable to officers on the retired list of the Army, who, when on such duty, shall receive full pay and allowance of the rank in the regular Army held by them at their retirement, as prescribed by law for officers on the active list.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the opinions which I entertain on the question before the Senate have long been formed and are decided. Indeed they are convictions. Representing a State with an area of 273,000 square miles, with its entire western boundary subject to Indian raids, it is but reasonable that I should take a deep interest in the adoption of a policy best adapted to the protection of the frontier. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has told us to-day that the policy of transferring the Indian Bureau back to the War Department is in effect a declaration of war; that it is setting back the clock of civilization and of Christian influences; that it is war to the extermination of the nomadic tribes. If this be true, it would be a war to be deprecated by all Christian and enlightened people. In every case where a question of fact is to be settled, the true course to be pursued is to take the best evidence of which the case is susceptible. Where the true course to be pursued toward the Indians, looking also to the protection of the frontier, is the question, as it is here, then those best acquainted with the habits of the Indians and with the proper methods of their control are the best witnesses if they be credible. The same rule which would apply in a court of justice in a case of fact would apply with equal force in the Senate on a question of fact. The best evidence of which a case is susceptible is that which is required by law to be offered. The Senator from Illinois has given his opinions on this question, and I propose before I conclude to furnish the evidence of men who have had the best possible means of knowing the truth in respect to the question before the Senate. I propose to traverse every material position which has been taken by the Senator from Illinois in reference to the true mode of conducting Indian affairs.

First, it has been stated that General Washington was in favor of Christianizing, enlightening, and educating the Indian, in teaching him the methods of peace; and that General Knox was also in favor of it. Undoubtedly that is true. The Senate would be led by the inferences of the Senator to believe that all the Christianity, all the civilization, all the enlightenment which some of the former nomadic tribes now have are the result of what is generally called the peace policy. Yet it is true that long, long before the Interior Department was ever heard of, long before the Indian Bureau was transferred to the Interior Department, some tribes, notably the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws were Christianized; they were passing rapidly on toward enlightenment; they had their own villages, their own schools and churches, their own shops and farms and cattle and horses. Neighbors to me, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, the Cherokees, the Seminoles, and the Creeks, years before this transfer to the Interior Department was made, owned their own farms, had their own schools, some of them spoke the English language, owned their own stock, had their own churches, and were rapidly emerging from the state of the original savage to that of Christian civilization. It is therefore not true that they owe their progress to the so-called peace policy. They had their own forms of government, their legislature, with an upper and lower house and their governor, like the white people. All this they had, I say, before the Interior Department itself was ever heard of or the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the Interior Department was accomplished, and years before this wonderful peace policy which is now talked about as the best that has ever been adopted was ever thought of. I do not speak of the Indians of New York and their advance in civilization, nor of those in Michigan. Senators who represent those States understand that matter better than I do. I speak of those who live in my neighborhood and who advanced, I know, far beyond their original nomadic relations to a condition of civilization and Christianity while the Indian Bureau was entirely and exclusively under the control of the War Department, and whose condition has not at all been bettered by the peace policy. Facts speak louder than any theory.

It has been said that this transfer was made under a democratic administration. Those of us who remember the history of this transfer know very well that it was in a whig administration that the Interior Department was created, and it was in a whig administration that the Indian Bureau was transferred to the Interior Department. I am speaking of a historical fact, and we all, who remember anything about the history of that transaction, know perfectly well that the Interior Department was established in order to get the ability and statesmanship of Thomas Ewing into the Cabinet of President Taylor.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to controvert the proposition; but inasmuch as the Senator differs with me in my statement that it was done in a democratic administration, although it is entirely immaterial, I wish to call his attention to the fact that in 1834, when the law was passed by Congress under which the transfer was made in 1849, a democratic administration was then in power.

Mr. MAXEY. The administration of President Taylor was inaugurated in 1849, on the 4th of March.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator well remembers that the Interior Department was organized in 1849, but the Indian Bureau was taken from the War Department (which was not done until 1849, when the Interior Department was organized) under the law of 1834, which was passed in a democratic administration.

Mr. MAXEY. As a question of history, (though not material, still it is best to be accurate,) the Indian Bureau was never transferred to the Interior Department until in 1849, when that Department was established, while it is true, as a question of history, that the Indians were under the control of the War Department from 1789 down to 1849. It is also true that the Bureau itself was not organized as a bureau until the year 1832.

It has been said that under the control of the War Department the expenses were greater; that there was more extravagance during those days than since the peace policy was inaugurated. Is that true? I had the honor upon the 6th of March last to offer a resolution of inquiry in these words:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish for the information of the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, a statement showing the annual expenditures of the Indian Bureau since its organization to the present time, and also the number of Indians provided for at the expense of the Government each year since the organization of said Indian Bureau.
